Trading Stamp Legislation Clarified by State Senator

By RICHARD RICHARDS
State Senator

Legislation enacted by the 1959 Legislature to provide closer regulation of trading-stamp practices became effective on July 1, when the new fiscal year began.

The new regulatory provisions now in effect were contained in two separate bills, and at the time they were being considered my office received a great many letters from housewives who saved the stamps themselves and were fearful that the practice might be too closely restricted or abolished altogether.

* * *

AS IT TURNED out, these fears were groundless, since the new regulations actually provide greater protection for stamp savers from unsound or mismanaged operations in the trading-stamp field.

Trading stamp companies must now be licensed by the Corporations Commissioner, and to obtain a license they must post a bond ranging from $25,000 to $100,000, depending upon the annual volume of their business.

SHOULD A trading stamp company default in the redemption of its stamps, the Commissioner may file a claim against the company and its surety on behalf of stamp holders.

A further requirement is that the company must redeem its goods in merchandise or cash at the option of the holder, and the commissioner is empowered to suspend or revoke licenses after a public hearing.

* * *

THE NAME of the trading stamp firm issuing stamps must be printed on each stamp, along with their cash-redemption value in cents, mills or fractions. Stamps presented for redemption in cash must have an aggregate value of at least a dollar.

A merchant proposing to discontinue the use of stamps is required to post a notice to that effect prominently displayed in every place where stamps are issued.

No trading stamp company may stop issuing stamps without giving 90 days' notice to the Corporations Commissioner and to each merchant in the state who issues its stamps. Violations are punishable by fines up to $1,000.

* * *

THE NEW LAW does not apply to merchants who issue their own coupons to customers and redeem them in cash or from their own stocks.

At this date I do not foresee any difficulties that may be put in the way of stamp savers, but they will be assured of many additional protections that they did not have before.
