Inventor Wins 'Sand Battle'

by the operators of the machine! In fact, so certain does the builder want to be that all recovered articles are accounted for, that he has bonded the operator of the picking belt for $25,000.

For the first time in the history of surf-bathing and beach-going the public stands a chance of recovering lost watches, wallets, rings, and objects of a sentimental value that have a way of hiding themselves in the sand. This machine will sift the sands of an entire beach, expose the uncovered objects to the bonded operator of the conveyor picking belt, who will remove anything of value. These will be catalogued with the Life Guard station.

Where a person stood one chance in a million of finding a lost watch before the odds have reversed themselves and now it is one chance in a million that if the machine has passed over the area where the watch was lost—the life guards will have it listed.

Unreturnable items of value such as money, and unclaimed articles will be liquidated and the monies derived from such sales will be put into a fund to advertise the beaches that have been sanitized.

Many have asked where the inventor will get his revenue to operate this and other models of the mechanical beachcomber. Already the County of Los Angeles is ager to lease the machine to cleanse its miles of sand ocean frontage. Cities like Newport, Balboa, Laguna Beach, Long Beach, Santa Monica, and Huntington Beach and state-owned beaches have been screaming for years for a machine that would work.

It looks as though they will have one.

Built in the shops of the D. B. Lewis Co., formerly the Martin Tool and Die Co. at 1150 Border avenue, corner of Torrance boulevard, the machine makes full use of man's knowledge of metallurgy in providing diamond-hard steel edges on its buckets and plow blades.

The man who conceived the idea for this machine spent hours running all kinds of sands through all kinds of screens and other sifting devices to find a combination that would work. He broke bottles and threw them into the testing sands. He dumped nails, garbage and even watches into the testing apparatus in his search for the right materials.

Completed, the machine looks and operates similar to a trench-digging machine. Where a trench digger makes a narrow but deep cut, this machine takes a bite six inches deep and six and one-half feet wide into the sand, carries it up over a series of cogs and deposits all that is left in the buckets onto a belt that passes before the bonded observer who removes the valuables from the trash and deposits the debris into a container that is later carted from the area for disposal.

Pending the arrival of additional buckets which are being made especially for this machine the American Manganese Co., the inventor is making late changes and refinements before starting production on future models.

Chatten intends to build and assemble additional models of the machine in Torrance because the city fans out to many of the most frequently visited beaches in the southland, and because of its industrial plants.

A man with a vision of seeing the world's beaches as clean as they were the day that man first visited the seashore. Chatten has formed a corporation called Sanitized Beaches that will eventually outlaw wildcat beachcombers who live on earnings greater than $4000 yearly, derived from raking the beach with a screen, keeping the money they find and selling articles recovered.

Eventually he plans not only to rid the beaches of trash but pass the sand through the rays of ultra violet light and sterlize the material as it is sifted. He also hopes to put an iron boot on athlete's foot and other infectious bacteria not killed by sunlight, by spraying the sands with chemicals such as are used in swimming pools.

He hopes that the 1400 first aid cases reported to the county life guards last year will be substanially reduced on beaches that have been Sanitized and that parents of small children who have seen their curious offspring come wandering up the beach lugging some pieces of unhealthy scrap left by some not-too-thoughtful beach goer will be encouraged to visit beaches that have been swept clean by this tractor-toted iron broom.
