Radio Relay League 30 Years Old; 25,000 Hams Now in Armed Services

Amateur radio will begin its fourth decade of organized activity next month with more than 25,000 "hams" in military service and additional thousands employed in civilian war effort, producing and operating much-needed radio equipment.

The American Radio Relay League, the national association of amateur radio operators, was founded in May, 1914, to correlate the plans and ideals of the few scattered "hams" of that time and champion their cause. In its 30 years of operation it has maintained headquarters in West Hartford, Conn., where for its first quarter of a century its destiny was guided by the late Hiram Percy Maxim, the famous scientist and inventor, who was until his death its founder-president.

Outstanding Service

The cohesion of amateur activities resulting from formation of the league paved the way for the outstanding service "hams" have been able to provide both in peace and war.

Amateur radio operators have found their talents especially adapted to the demands of war. In 1917 some 4,000 of the total of 6,000 existing "hams" joined the armed services and made their hobby pay dividends for a militant Uncle Sam. The stepped-up tempo of World War II with its diversification of communications demands has brought a large part of the expanded "ham" fraternity into range of enemy guns, working and directing a job with a skill which sleepless nights had helped perfect during peacetime.

The interim between wars was the busiest in "ham" history. It was the period of amateur development of the short-wave region below 200 meters to which they had been relegated by the federal radio law of 1912, a region now regarded as the most valuable and important in radio. "Hams" first spanned the continent and then the oceans, astonishing everyone who had regarded the wave lengths of 200 meters and below as an almost worthless void.

Records* in the league offices evidence the public service provided by amateurs during floods, hurricanes, earthquakes and other disasters, and the aid given in keeping communication lanes open between scientific expeditions and homelands.

For War Emergency

Wartime home activity involves the use of radio amateurs as experts in civilian emergency groups, instructors of military classes in radio and as manufacturers of war-bound short-wave communications equipment.

When the war caused amateur operators as such to go off the air, there were an estimated 60,000 licensed radio "hams" in the United States. The possibilities of a mushroom post-war growth in the ranks are apparent in the fact that hundreds of thousands of additional men have been trained in short-wave radio by the military services to supply vital war communications.

The end result, as the league envisions it, may well be a huge increase in the backlog of amateur radio talent, available to the nation for any future emergency.
