HISTORIANS RETRACE TRAIL OF LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION

Roaring along over bands of steel, a special train bearing the Columbia River Historical Expedition has retraced, in two weeks, the trail that Lewis and Clark, 120 years ago, took two years to blaze through thousands of miles of uncharted wilderness.

The 125-foot monument overlooking the Columbia river and Astoria, Ore.

First to Thomas Jefferson, second to Lewis and Clark, goes credit for the fact that the boundaries of the United States extend west of the Mississippi river today. Without his sagacity in negotiating the Louisiana purchase, it is easy to imagine that our history would have been like that of small European countries, surrounded by hostile nations and forced to maintain a large standing army for the protection of its boundaries.

Seemed Dangerous That the sparsely populated nation on the eastern part of the continent should attempt to acquire and actually hold the vast territory to the west was, to many, a project fraught with danger. But the author of the Declaration of Independence, glimpsing even then the potentialities of his infant country, bought from France the land that was to make the United States a world power.

Ceded in 1803 for the absurd sum of $15,000,000, the area included the present states of Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Colorado, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Wyoming and Montana.

Even before the purchase, Jefferson was anxious to start an exploration of the territory west and north of the city of New Orleans. He realized its importance, realized that still further west lay the rich Oregon territory held by Spain. Plans for the exploration of Lewis and Clark actually were made before France had ceded the territory.

Cost $2500 Various delays resulted until, in 1803, it was deemed necessary to establish further contracts with the Indians. The purchase as yet unaccomplished, Jefferson secured $2500 for exploration and appointed Lewis to make the venture.

Meriwether Lewis was a youthful and daring army captain, so trusted by Jefferson that he had been made his private secretary. Lewis chose as his companion William Clark, an old friend. Clark was commissioned second lieutenant and later made a captain.

Neither man knew the dangers that they might face on the long trek into the northwest. Besides the natural hardships, they would encounter several Indian tribes, some of them possibly hostile.

To Oregon On May 14, 1804, they left the mouth of the Missouri river and followed it to a point several hundred miles west and south of the headwaters of the Columbia. The stream they followed to Astoria, Ore. and returned to St. Louis September 23, 1806.

This month, the trail of the two explorers was followed again by a group of historians and writers, as well as the winners of the high school oratorical contest on "The French Pioneers in America." The trip was organized by the governors of Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington and Oregon.

Local Color The special train of the Great Northern Railroad was elaborately equipped, and the "local color" for the occasion was taken along. One entire car was fitted up as a museum, containing Northwest Indian relics, curios, tools and firearms.

Another car contained a complete historical library and a third had an especially lighted art gallery with paintings of memorable events in the building of the northwest.

On Coxcomb Hill, overlooking the site of old Fort Astoria, a monument given by Vincent Astor was dedicated. The train also visited Fort Union on the upper Mississippi, Fort Benton in Montana, and the Great Falls of the Missouri, discovered by Lewis and Clark.

Another monument was dedicated at Bommer's Ferry, Idaho, and two days were spent in Glacier National Park.
