

Millinery Picturing Sports Makes Its Debut on Fashionable Heads

By JULIA BOTTOMLEY

There is an interesting trend of realism developing in the realm of millinery in that certain new models interpret the occasion for which they are intended. The group of "topic hats," as some call them, as here pictured, tell the story of the new movement at a glance. These models, which are so directly interpretative, bring to mind a discussion which took place quite some time ago in a circle of designers concerning the possibilities of millinery art. The question brought up was "Can a hat have expression?" Is it possible for it to tell a story as does a picture? Without a doubt the query finds its answer in the smart 1927 millinery in this picture. Is tennis your hobby? Could anything more apropos in the way of millinery for the occasion be conceived than the first hat in this group? Note how the tennis net is suggested with a lattice-work of straw braid, together with a clever placement of racket and ball in lieu of an ornament. You prefer golf? Was ever a hat better tuned to the sport than the one shown at the top to the right? Clever is that grassy arrangement of straw fringe around the crown, not to mention the ingenuity of the golf sticks and bag effect. An enthusiast over football? On

tion of the hour, moved for adjournment but an old Puritan leader, Davenport Stanford, declared that it the first day had come he wanted to be found at his place of duty. He moved that candles be brought so that the house could proceed. "There was quietness in that man's mind—the quietness of heavenly wisdom—an inflexible willingness to obey present duty. Duty, then, is the sublimest word in our language. Do your duty in all things, like the old Puritan. You cannot do more. You should never wish to do less." By NELLIE MAXWELL FOR THE CONVALESCENT More insistent than the call for food is the desire for drink, in both health and illness. The sense of hunger may depart, but the desire for drink is seldom lost. In illness the thought of food is often distasteful, but the desire for fluids is intensified. White water is the one drink most desired for quenching thirst, other drinks are highly enjoyed by both sick and well. In illness, besides quenching thirst, liquids reduce the temperature of the patient; they also serve as a form to give nourishment when more solid foods are refused or cannot be taken. Drinks relieve nausea, stimulate the heart, excite the gastric juices, control bowels, and soothe the congested state of the alimentary canal. So we must recognize their importance in dealing with illness. All drinks, as well as other foods, given to a patient should be subject to the advice of the physician in attendance, for even harmless grape juice has proved fatal in cases recovering from typhoid. Like everything else prepared for the invalid's table, all beverages should be made and served with the utmost cleanliness. A smelly, thick glass of lukewarm lemonade or other drink which should be cool and attractive to the eye, would nauseate a well person. Various fruit juices of other kinds than lemon and orange may be used, though these are used most commonly, for they are the best liked. Ginger ale with a little grape juice is a fine cooling drink; pineapple, raspberry in shrub or sirup, all are good. They are most acceptable when chilled or served with chipped ice added. When beverages of any kind, hot or cold, are carried to a sick room they should be covered, and never left uncovered in the sick room. Very hot beverages stimulate the digestive fluids, while cold ones retard and lower the temperature in fever. (Copyright, 1927)

Father To Son Letter Writing In Danger of Becoming Lost Art

Letter writing by fathers to sons who are away from home is becoming a lost art, the revival of which will be urged during the coming year by a group of educational and religious organizations. Although close companionship between father and son is constantly being emphasized, it is asserted that there are few parents in these modern times whose correspondence gives the continuous counsel concerning homely virtues that was customary in the last century and is contained in the collected works of many great men of the country. A model father-to-son letter has been discovered in some unpublished letters of Robert E. Lee. It was written 75 years ago, and says: "You must study to be frank with the world; frankness is the child of honesty and courage. Say what you mean to do on every occasion and take it for granted you mean to do what is right." "Nearly a century ago there came 'the dark day' when the sun was slowly extinguished as an eclipse. Members of the Legislature of Connecticut in session shared the general awe and terror, believing the Day of Judgment had come. Someone, in the consterna-

is tiresome and thankless work. Like the man who complained of growing tired of eating hog's head continually. "That's tasty stuff," remarked a friend. "Maybe, but I'd rather eat farther back in the hog," was his retort. "You won't complain if you let us do your sheet metal work. Skilled tinsmiths are at your service."

Most of us like houses that appear substantial. Masonry construction with stucco finish and with simple detail gives one just this effect. Then, too, the substantial house has a number of practical features that argue well for its adoption. First, there is the item of maintenance and repairs, a very important one; then there is the item of fire protection and insurance, together with the selling factor in case one decides to dispose of his home a few years after it is built. All point to good sound construction and conservative design. In this little house the architect combines with a substantial and attractive exterior all of the advantages of a well laid out and economical plan, along conservative, practical lines. One enters the house through the porch into a small vestibule, the usual hall being eliminated. This arrangement gives over all space to the living room, where it is most desired, while the vestibule gives privacy to the entrance that would be lacking should one enter directly into the living room. A group of windows that occupies the full length of one side of the kitchen gives plenty of light where it is most needed. The complete equipment of the kitchen and the adjoining pantry gives assurance that the "business end" of the house has not been overlooked. It has been laid out for convenience, comfort and economy. The heater room, laundry and storage space are located in the cellar. The second floor has three bedrooms and a bath. The bath is tiled and the tub is built in, giving not only an attractive appearance but also saving time in cleaning. The hall has been reduced to a size that allows room for the necessary doors to the various rooms and the required free space, but no more. This allows the room to be given over to more useful space, such as the bedrooms. The small hall also shortens steps to the bathroom, both from the bedrooms and from the stairs, so that it is readily reached from the first floor. This house would require a lot with a frontage of about 45 feet to give it a proper setting. Its cost is about $5800.
