TIME

By JOHN TWEEDDALE OF TORRANCE

Before the beginning God was. And at his side, upon the throne of eternity, sits Time, serene and silent, watching ever through the ages; celestial worlds may perish and flash through the night on their way to the funeral pyre of material things; earthly empires may rise from the ashes of the past and vanish in the dust of tomorrow; intellectualism may come of blossom and fade, and great men spring, fully armed, from the fountain of life, to shine for a brief space in the jeweled crown of achievement. But finally all must come to rest upon the lap of Time.

When the gaunt spectre of suffering and sorrow enters in at the gates of our earthly home and lays his heavy hand upon us; or when the sinuous tentacle of poverty grips at our throat and despair rides with us down the winding trails of life, Time pours out the golden nectar of hope from the crystal vial of days unborn and our wounds are healed.

So it was when the Divine Creator formed man from the dust of the earth, Time was given dominion over him and his days on earth were numbered. Time is therefore the uncompromising, unyielding and withal merciful master of our destiny and beside intelligence, God's most precious gift to humanity.

Time and opportunity, like meteoric light in their transitory blaze across the firmament of heaven, are within our reach for an instant, then gone beyond recall. No human hand can, forsooth, turn back the sun in its orbit, or the stars in their flight. Neither can any earthly power stay the passage of the hours and minutes across the luminous dial of the great clock of endless duration.

Time sits on the supreme bench of the mundane court of last resort, and through its august portals must pass all violators of the immutable laws of nature, and of nature's God. Into his judicial presence is haled the human "talking machine," that egotistical parasite who transgresses the tripartite provisions of a sublime creation; wherein is set aside: A time for mental and physical work; a time for amusement and contemplation; and a time for repose. Here, too, are brought the thieves of times, who thoughtlessly and triflingly squander unnecessarily hours in the performance of their daily tasks. Lastly come the most virulent of all: the incessant tollers and busybodies, who reckon naught of the rights of man, nor yet of the teachings of Holy Writ; which saith: "Consider the lilies of the field how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin, And yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." In this mighty court of Time, justice is meted out in accordance with the first principles of creation, and when the guilty finally pass from its majestic precincts to the place of retribution, each individual becomes the instrument of his own punishment, and is incarcerated within himself; so that in this great penal institute of Time we behold countless human nonentities, standing like grim sentinels of an unavoidable fate, on the rocky shores of the turbulent sea of life, watching with unseeing eyes across its foam flecked surface for the ships that will never come in. Deep in a watery grave lie these moss grown hulks of things that might have been, while their phantom crews in unearthly form climb the tangled rigging, to set ghostly sails for the last great voyage.

Brilliant rays from the dawning of youth invite procrastination, but all too soon, Time lays his hoary mantle over it, and like a thief in the night, opportunity flies quickly into the shadows and is gone beyond revocation. We must, therefore, carry the banners of consumption over the ramparts of success, while the fires of youth still burn brightly in the crucible of this transitory existence, to the end, that when Time sits with us in the soft glow of the sunset of life; his silvery locks and clear discerning eyes will be an ever present reminder of that shadowy universe, beyond the veil, where age in the fleecy robes of a well-earned peace, walks the flower-strewn pathways of eternal happiness.

Little Flower Hats Vie With Feather Toques for Spring

By JULIA BOTTOMLEY

Back to the truly feminine! It is a fact proclaimed at every turn in fashion's lane. Frocks with a soft silhouette, shoes that are colorful, jewelry frankly ornate, scarfs and other accessories of the gayest. To tune in with the enchanting spring song of fashion, hats cannot be otherwise than flowery and feathery, lace-laden and be-ribboned, and of flattering becomingness. All of which they are.

There's for instance, the flower toques and the feather toques over which Paris raises this spring. They bespeak none other than the truly feminine. Highly finished leaves in multi-foliate colorings were used in creating the attractive toque shown first in this picture. Which reminds one that a season is predicted of very shiny straws, lacquered flowers and glossy leaves, also many ribbons of fine finish. Little berries, in both red and white, combine with highly glossed leaves to achieve the charm expressed in the toque centered to the left.

mulan straw with wee flat blossoms. Grosgrain ribbon is pleated and folded in novel manner to form a side trim. The pretty custom of wearing a boutonniere repeating the flowers of one's hat is observed in this instance. Milliners everywhere are now selling costume bouquets to match the hat. Just to show the type of feather toques which are the fashion both here and abroad, we call attention to the exquisite model which lovely Ethelyn Claire of Hollywood is wearing this spring. This picture might well be called "a study in sweater dress, fur fox neckpiece and her immaculate gloves are also snowy white." (Copyright 1928, W. N. U.)
