Plan Now for Winter Sweet Peas

By F. C. McNABB It is well to plan ahead for your next winter's sweet peas. The planting season for these opens August first, and since they (sweet peas) respond admirably to fertilization, it is well to begin soil preparations sometime in advance of planting.

The Early Winter Flowering Spencer Sweet Peas enjoy an east or west exposure during the winter months. Planting near a building sometimes is added protection from frost and this is sometimes a necessary precaution. A liberal quantity of barnyard fertilizer spaded into a good depth during June or early July will provide plant food elements for the immediate use of the plant after the seed has germinated. The more often the soil is turned and the more pulverized it is, the better will be the results, both in germination and in growing. Your sweet peas will probably be no better than the soil preparation you make for them.

How to Plant Planting season begins August first, and for mid-winter blooming, planting should be made either during August or September. Open a furrow five to six inches deep in freshly turned soil, and after having inoculated the seed with Mullford Culture, plant the seed in the bottom of the furrow at the rate of one ounce to a thirty foot row, covering to a depth of about one inch. Firm the soil to the seed with the back of the rake and leave a loose mulch on the surface. There should be sufficient moisture in the soil at the time of planting to germinate the seed and to grow the plant well above the surface before additional water is supplied. In case it becomes necessary to turn water into the row to germinate the seed, be sure that it is kept thoroughly moist thereafter until the plants are well established. As they grow, fill the furrow gradually to the surface level and then for irrigating purposes open a furrow parallel to the seed row, being careful not to flood the seed row itself.

Thorough cultivation should follow each irrigation, leaving a dust mulch on the surface each time. With favorable weather conditions, plantings made during August and the first two weeks in September should produce flowers for the Christmas season. Plantings at that time, however, require a little additional care to obtain a good germination of seed. Sweet pea seeds planted in warm soil and under the summer heat, will very often rot in the ground. Therefore, it is necessary to provide shade for the seed row, and this may be done by covering the row with large green weeds or by placing some other similar material on top of the row to shade it and at the same time to allow a free circulation of air to keep the soil cool. After the seed has germinated, and the plants have reached the height of about one inch the covering should be removed and the plants given full sunlight. California climatic conditions are ideal for the growing of sweet peas, but it is important that the Early Winter Flowering Spencers be planted during the fall months. There are several types and strains, and it is important that the winter flowering type be planted for winter flowers.
