

What? No More Curb Debates In Torrance?

A Long Beach newspaper columnist sees "serious consequences" for this city with the newly-passed ordinance in effect. His opinion of the new law is not very complimentary and yet—the ordinance on busy scanning reveals that if local police vigorously enforce it, gone will be the days when we gathered at the curb to discuss football, weather, taxes, mutual friends and what-not.

Here is the columnist's story: "Over at Torrance the city councilmen have discovered something new to legislate against. They have passed an ordinance to prohibit sitting or standing on curbs or sidewalks. They must want a town walkathon.

"If two friends meet on the street, they will have to content themselves with 'hello' and 'good-by' or else circle around each other like two boxers sparring for an opening. As they mill around they may converse logically, though inconveniently, but if they stop they will be standing on the sidewalk and may be tapped on the shoulder by a policeman.

"The window shopper also must develop a new technique. No longer may she meticulously and critically inspect the window dresser's art, with an occasional furtive glance at her own reflection in the glass. The window shopper must learn to get her eye-felt as she goes by—a sort of inverted moving picture performance, the motion in this case being by the spectator.

"Nor are these the only or the most serious consequences of the Torrance ordinance. It strikes at American democracy. How can a town be governed if its citizens and taxpayers can't gather on the corner and tell one another how the council ought to run the government? Long Beach could not survive as a self-governing community without curbstone oratory, and we don't see how Torrance can do it.

"Postscript: We made our remarks on the strength of the headline. In the Torrance article under the headline it says that the ordinance will be enforced only when such sitting or standing upon walks or curbs has a tendency to cause disturbance. One must not sit or stand in a riotous manner. Okeh."
