Two pilots, Captain Gordon Campbell and Colonel Charles W. Kerwood, literally "flew in flames" on the nights of June ninth, tenth, and eleventh, 1919, at Atlantic City.

The object of the flight was to test the plane against a non-inflammable paint, or "dope," with which the linen fabric and wooden structure of the machine had been coated. A spray system supplied gasoline, which was ignited by an electrical attachment. Each night the flaming machine remained aloft for nine minutes.

Although they were flying in an open machine, neither Campbell nor Kerwood was injured in the slightest. They wore ordinary clothing, and carried no parachutes.

Captain Campbell later met his death while flying. Colonel Kerwood is still active in aeronautics, and is a member of the executive committee of the Ligue Internationale des Aviateurs. He recently commanded the American aviators during the Rif uprising in Morocco.

In addition to his one hour record, Pete Shuster skipped rope 105 times in 30 seconds.

Skipping 7,518 times in one hour, Shuster eclipsed the record of 6,363, set by Chester Levere, of Chicago. Levere holds numerous rope-skipping records; in 1931, on his sixty-first birthday, he skipped 18,500 times... without once stopping. He was in action for three hours and 15 minutes, and lost seven pounds.
