MARY FENTRESS

PARIS. (U.P.)—Moygashel Irish linens are being shown in all the big couture houses for the spring and summer collections. Everything from beach clothes to evening gowns is made in linen this year. The weaves vary from a very sheer linen voile to a coarse, bumpy weave that looks exactly like homespun or tweed.

Arduane uses linen voile in a pale orchid pink for a girlish evening gown made with short, puffed sleeves and a very bouffant full skirt. The same couturier uses a natural linen in a heavier weave for a yachting dress that is worn with a bright blue blazer.

Shantel—a linen which is woven to look like Shantung—is used in several costumes at Heim. One in navy has tiny cap sleeves trimmed with two rows of white braid. The short, full jacket which has three-quarter length sleeves likewise is trimmed with double rows of white braid which run along the neck and jacket opening, as well as banding the hem.

Plaids modeled after the genuine Scotch tartans are shown in linen everywhere. Most of these have blue or mauve tones outstanding. These are made in a light weight, compact weave. Marcel Rochas uses one based on the MacKenzie tartan in dark blue, light blue, green and yellow striped by narrow double bands of bright red. The skirt is pleated all the way around and worn with a blouse of natural linen voile while the tailored jacket is in navy linen.

Shorter Skirts Are Coming In; Spring Fashions Told

Skirts on the correct spring wardrobe will be 13 1/2 inches from the floor, it is indicated in reports received this week from the outstanding fashion centers.

Swagger coats are definitely "in" this year, developed in three shades of tan—paddock, leather and saddle—and beige, the color that is winning most attention of all.

Three-piece suits in two colors, and short, capes of matching material, but lined with gay prints, are an outstanding note. Prints this year are very precise, at their best in black and white or brown and white. Shoes and hose are important in the general ensemble, because of the definitely shorter skirts.

Movies Depict Development of Natural Gas from Ancient Origin to Present-Day Uses

Armed conflict and threats of conflict in Europe which menace the economic stability of the entire world today had their inception in the terms of the peace treaty concluded at Versailles 18 years ago, Rudolph Huber, university student and president of the International Relations Society at the University of Southern California, asserted when he addressed the National Business and Professional Women at their public relations meeting Monday night.

Huber gave a comprehensive view of the European situation in discussing the present day conditions, and brought out many points of intricate dealings which were new and interesting to his hearers. Efforts of the United States to place this nation on a firm basis of lawful neutrality in the case of foreign wars, without prejudice to either itself or the warring nations, were touched upon in the light of recent Congressional action.

Educational Film Screened Following Huber's address the club and guests were entertained with a motion picture film supplied by the Southern California Gas company under the direction of Mr. Jones and Mr. Harris, company employees. The film depicted the story of the development of natural gas from its origin, perhaps 20 million years ago, down to the present day.

The portions of the film which showed the herculean job of laying pipe lines in mountainous regions, the strange and wonderful machines which are required to do the work, and the tremendous obstacles which have to be overcome in laying a pipe line brought startled exclamations of wonder from the spectators.

The uses of gas in manufacturing and commercial enterprises, industrial and domestic purposes were vividly portrayed. The film was highly educational and not the least interesting phase was the showing of the inner works of a gas meter, the measuring device by which the flow of gas into plants, homes, and institutions in computed.

20-30 Club Guests.
The business women had as their guests at this meeting the members of the 20-30 club, new service group in the city, and were greatly pleased to have a good representation from that group in spite of the heavy rains which swept the city at the dinner hour.

FOR THE SAKE OF SHADOWS: by Max Miller: "Miller's roof needed a new covering, and his car a new top, so he found himself, like other writers before him, sitting in a Hollywood studio with new pencils, paper, and a well-oiled typewriter, planning what to do with a boy and a girl and the U. S. Coast Guard." Thus starts the diary of an author trying to crash into the Hollywood scenario writing game.

There is neither plot nor action, but one amusing sketch after another. However behind the light hearted fooling one discovers the puzzled wrath of the conscientious writer who wants to do work after all, no matter how he is paid, and can't find how it is to be done—also why perhaps, you will see a picture with credit given to novelist A, and B, the celebrated playwright, and then wonder what happened to their minds.

BRANDEIS by Alfred Lief: The career and achievements of Louis Brandeis are in themselves sufficiently full in important events to invest a simple record of them with ample life and color and Mr. Lief has written just such a record. Brandeis has been in the forefront of every liberal movement, and his record on the Bench in defense of human rights is too well known for comment.

A life devoted essentially to public service, useful, courageous and effective, is revealed with simplicity leaving the reader fully aware that after twenty years of service on the Supreme Court, Mr. Brandeis' fame is secure as one of the outstanding justices in the whole 146 years of Supreme Court history.

RICH MAN POOR MAN by Janet Fairbanks: Understanding politics, Mrs. Fairbanks catches the thrill of them. She knows her Chicago and describes it with rare warmth in her story. This rather long but very interesting novel, spans the period from the nomination of Theodore Roosevelt in 1912 and the exciting Bull Moose campaign, through the World War and up to 1929. All these events from a rich background form a human interest story of love and ambition, disappointment and frustration, of courage and triumphant character.
