Peasants Decorate Lonely Grave of Quentin Roosevelt Today

CHATEAU THIERRY (U.P.)—Sturdy French peasants paused in their work today to pick flowers for the isolated grave of Lieut. Quentin Roosevelt who 20 years ago today crashed to death behind German lines in his flaming airplane.

The son of America's "TR" is buried where he fell, on a once blood-stained battleground, now a wheat field vivid with the same wild scarlet poppies that grow in Flanders fields. At the request of Mrs. Edith Kermit Roosevelt the grave of her youngest son—dug for him by his German foes—has remained untouched through two decades. Quentin Roosevelt's companions sleep in the nearby American cemetery at Fere-en-Tardenois.

Despite its isolation, Quentin's simple burial mound is the most visited of all A.E.F. graves. French school children of the countryside regard the young American as a legendary hero. Every Memorial Day, Fourth of July and All Saints Day they make their pilgrimage to the wheatfield grave, often accompanied by their parents.

Two monuments now mark young Roosevelt's grave. One is a large field stone dragged there by the 302nd U. S. Engineers, who carved their own name on the memorial with an added note that: "Here fell Quentin Roosevelt." The other marker is a white cross, identical with the thousands of others that dot France and Belgium, bearing the flier's rank and squadron, the 95th, of the 1st Allied Pursuit group.

A surrounding white fence, freshly painted every spring, was built by American engineers in 1918 to replace the tree boughs which Germans originally placed to keep the grave inviolate.

Among the flowers blanketing the mound will be a wreath sent from Paris without a card—from Quentin Roosevelt's mother.
