Conserve Manpower By Shopping Early

One of the most vital factors of our war effort is manpower. In addition to the hundreds of thousands of men that are needed by the armed forces to fly the planes, man the tanks, sail the ships, shoot the guns and perform the innumerable duties that are necessary to an efficient striking force, there are other millions of men needed in the war industries to provide the fighters with the tools of war. After these needs have been filled from the nation's reservoir of manpower, the "home front" must be served.

But there are not sufficient men left to do all the necessary work on farms, in factories, and in the stores. Women have taken on some of the jobs that were formerly held by men. Also, it has been found necessary to move many of the men in civilian life from their regular work to new duties. As a result, there are probably more people working at jobs with which they are not entirely familiar than at any time in our country's history.

Most types of work carry along at an even pace all day long, and a person who is learning a new routine has no unusual demand placed on his ability at any one time during the day. This is not true, however, in retail stores. Rush periods occur late in the day and late in the week in practically all retail establishments.

Best Shopping Hours
The shopping habits of the American people must be met by the employees of these stores, whether they are experienced salespeople or not. And the new employees are doing their best to do just that. But if they fail, the retail store must hire additional help. And extra employees must be taken from the already strained reserve of manpower . . . men and women who could be making greater contribution to the war effort.

In the solution of the problem, we can all help. The best way to relieve rush periods in stores is to buy at times when the stores are not busy. Best hours to shop are 10 a. m. till 2 p. m. The best days are Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays.

An early shopper enjoys personal advantages too. Selection is better early in the day, and service is much faster before the stores become crowded. Can you be counted on to give additional aid to the Victory program by shopping early in the week and early in the day?

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS TO HOLD CARD PARTY
