Victory Gardens

Keep V-Gardens Working

As days begin to shorten, Victory gardeners begin to shift from spring planting schedules to fall garden planning. Keep the garden working until frost, is the plea from national food authorities to all home vegetable growers.

President Truman has taken the lead in urging the nation to raise as much home-grown food as possible. It is necessary to live from gardens as much as possible this summer and to provide, in one way or another, for home storage and preservation of supplies that will keep the family well fed in the winter.

Fruit Set on Tomatoes

It frequently happens that with early planted tomatoes many or all the first blooms drop off. This is caused by lack of pollination.

The tomato blossom is such that the pollen doesn't loosen up and fall onto the style when the weather is too cool. Varieties differ somewhat and some varieties will pollinate and set tomatoes at lower temperatures than will other varieties. It may happen that tomatoes with heavy vegetative growth will not set well even when the temperatures are optimum. It is said that too much nitrogen may stimulate the style in the flower to grow to excess length and thus interfere with pollination.

Some Victory gardeners have helped to set fruit on early tomatoes by jarring the blossoms to shake the pollen loose. This can easily be done by striking the flower cluster lightly with a stick or pencil.

That it is possible to secure high yields of tomatoes in this area was demonstrated last year in the San Fernando valley where a large acreage planted at the right season and properly cared for averaged over thirty-five tons to the acre, probably a world record.

Fall Potatoes

Although fall potatoes seldom yield as satisfactorily as the spring crop, the present uncertain conditions may justify the planting of potatoes for a fall crop where sufficient garden space is available. In the interior sections of central and southern California plantings may be made up to August 1, but seed should be planted between July 1 and 15 for the best results in coastal areas.

Normally, it is best to plant seed produced the previous fall to insure rapid sprouting and good stands. No old seed is available this year's spring grown seed will have to be used. The dormancy of the latter seed stock can be broken fairly well by storing the potatoes at a temperature of 70 to 80 degrees F. for four to six weeks immediately after digging. After removal from storage, the seed should be cut and planted immediately in moist soil. Do not allow the soil to dry out during the time the potatoes are sprouting. Since the dormancy of White Rose is broken easier than most other varieties, this variety is recommended when spring grown potatoes are to be used for seed.

Planting Dates For Celery

The growing of good celery is a test of the gardener's ability because this crop is exacting in its demand for careful culture and selection of planting dates. Celery will develop best quality if it matures during moderately cool weather. Nevertheless, if celery is exposed to cold weather during early growth stages, it will usually go to seed before reaching harvestable condition. Thus in order to grow good celery, plants should be set in the garden at the following approximate periods: Interior Valleys—July and early August; Outer Coast—July, August, March; Southern California—July, August, and early September; elevations exceeding 3500 ft.—April and May. After transplanting the plants should be shaded with a single or newspaper and watered frequently until growth starts. Celery often benefits from applications of manure or commercial nitrogen fertilizer.

Utah is an excellent green variety that will develop good quality without blanching; Golden Self Blanching, a yellow variety, usually requires wrapping two to three weeks prior to harvest.
