

Local Schools Ahead of State Requirements in History Classes

The teaching of American History and a study of the Constitution of the United States in all California schools, public and private is now compulsory, according to a new law recently signed by Governor Warren.

A new provision of the state Education code directs that not less than 15 semester periods of such instruction be offered in each secondary school.

Torrance High School, the Herald learned this week, is exceeding the requirements by 11 semester units. Courses in local, county and state government, American Constitution, American heritage, and American ideals are subjects taken by all pupils during part of the four-year high school curriculum here.

In addition, all seniors are required to complete a course in contemporary problems, which places emphasis on a study of the state and the federal constitution.

The new education law provision, proposed by assemblyman Charles E. Chapel of Inglewood, was passed by the legislature several months ago, and was signed by the governor last week. The provision applies to private schools as well as public.

Mandatory instruction of the governmental heritage and history course provides that all students who graduate from high school or college or a university, must have completed the required amount of study material, before they can receive diplomas.
