

Barrier Tests May Be Ready Next February

The West Basin barrier test may be ready for operation in mid-February, officials of the West Basin Water Association announced this week.

All that remains to be done before beginning the test is completion of the pipeline connecting the injection wells with the Metropolitan Water District pipeline, which is the source of fresh water to be injected as a barrier to salt water encroachment, the officials said.

Although some difficulty has been encountered in locating a chlorinator pump needed to treat the water to be injected, all injection and observation wells have been completed, they revealed. A few are still being pumped in the development process, however.

According to present estimates, funds allocated to the project will be sufficient to operate the test until July 1, when an additional amount will be needed from the $750,000 appropriation to continue the work.

The association tentatively plans to use treated effluent from Hyperion plant in a further extension of the barrier test. The effluent would be lifted over the sand dunes inland from Hyperion and spread in the area immediately west of International Airport.

After percolating into the sands at this location, the effluent would be recovered by low lift pumping, then filtered and completely reclaimed for injection into wells located near the spreading area.

Use of the effluent in this manner would cost an estimated $75,000.

Other business discussed at the association meeting included a skeleton bill introduced in the State Legislature which would legalize an assessment against production from water wells as a means of obtaining funds for the purchase of imported water to be used in replenishing overdrown ground water basins.

An effort to determine whether basin information on water quality in the Silverado zone can be obtained from a new well being drilled near the harbor in the Wilmington area. There are no existing wells which would give a clue to the threat of salt water intrusion.

Filing of a request with the Metropolitan Water District that capacity to serve the City of Hawthorne be included in the Inglewood lateral pipeline to be constructed along 92nd St. from Avalon Blvd. west to Crenshaw Blvd.
