Today is the Day to Practice Good Luck Superstitions—A Happy New Year to All

By MILDRED HUNT

Quaint and sometimes comical customs known for ages as folk lore, are followed on the first day of the New Year. Many of the customs originated centuries ago and have been handed down from family to family to assure good health, wealth and happiness during the coming year. In the deep south, it is customary to eat a heaping serving of black-eyed peas, cooked with hog jowls, to insure happiness during the coming twelve months of the year. So widely is this followed that even hotels and restaurants serve this combination on New Year's day beyond the Mason-Dixon line.

The more common custom which has survived the glaring disapproval of modern living, is to cook cabbage with a piece of money in it such as a dime or quarter. This is supposed to assure a steady supply of money during the coming year.

Perhaps these customs got their incentive when it was the old world custom for families and old friends to visit each other's homes bringing with them gifts or cards which they presented as a token of good luck for the coming year. In many countries today, the first day of the New Year is celebrated with festivals and parties much in the same manner as Christmas is marked in this country.

In France, it is a day set aside for family reunions and rejoicing with old and trusted friends. Wine glasses tinkle with the sounds of numerous toasts offered by gracious hosts.

Scotland is the land where the New Year is a day when the man of the house gets out her dust rags, mops and brooms and scours the inside of the house from floor to ceiling. As she sweeps, straws from her broom which loosen from the strenuous sweeping, are gathered up and tied with ribbon. These are kept until the next New Year's day and are considered lucky to have during the year. After the cleaning is over, friends and neighbors are expected to call. The first to step across the threshold is supposed to relate the fortune for the coming year. If the guests bring wine, ale or a holiday dainty that is indicated a good year will be enjoyed. If no present is brought, and the caller does not come bearing good wishes for the New Year, that is an indication of an unhappy year, according to Scottish custom.

In Germany, the custom is for each person to wear something new, and carry in his pocket a piece of money for good luck. The Greeks call the first day of the year St. Basil's Day and begin the day with special masses and religious ceremony. The remainder of the day is spent in festivals and the wearing of bright and colorful garb.

The people of England follow the custom of baking a New Year's cake with a coin in it. The head of the house cuts the cake and takes the first piece. The other members of the family are then served and whoever gets the piece with the coin, is supposed to enjoy wealth and happiness for the coming year.

Australia has a quaint custom of telling the weather for the coming twelve months ahead. Twelve layers of onion are covered with salt and let stand until the next morning. The layers holding the most moisture are supposed to be the months of the year when abundant rain is to be expected.

Whatever may be the custom followed on this New Year's day, it still remains the time to wish one and all a happy New Year.
