

Full Production At Steel Plant Resumed Mon.

Production has been resumed at the Torrance Works of U. S. Steel following settlement of contract differences between the industry and officials of the United Steelworkers of America.

The first heat from the plant's open hearth furnaces was poured at 10:10 p.m. Sunday, and the rolling mills and other plant facilities were put into production the next day.

Callbacks began at 8:32 p.m. Friday, a company spokesman said. That was the hour the firm was notified that the month-old strike had been settled.

Members of Local 1414 at the plant walked out at midnight, June 30, as steelworkers across the nation left their jobs. Negotiations were broken off several times as the union refused to bargain for a five-year contract. The new contract sets up a three-year, no-strike agreement with wage raises and other benefits throughout the three years.

About 825 persons were idled during July at the local plant.
