Tetanus Is Easy to Prevent, But Difficult or Impossible to Cure

Tetanus, or lockjaw, is easy to prevent, but difficult, expensive and often impossible to cure.

The public has been very conscious of the polio vaccination program established by the Los Angeles County Medical Association throughout the area, but many people seem less aware of the fact that we are equally interested in the prevention of tetanus. In the fall of the year many people fertilize their gardens and it is for this reason that we are calling attention to the danger of puncture wounds and cuts by both adults and children while working or playing in areas where animal fertilizer has been used.

IMMUNIZATION against this disease provides almost certain protection. Proof of this was seen during World War II when tetanus all but vanished among millions of servicemen who received this protection. This, despite the fact that war wounds present an ideal site for the bodily invasion and growth of tetanus germs. They are usually deep wounds, with much destruction of flesh, and frequently are wounds incurred by victims on the ground.

The organism which causes tetanus lives in the intestines of grass-eating animals, particularly horses and cattle. This accounts for the wide distribution of the germ in and about stables and farmyards, and in garden soil treated with animal manure.

INFECTION usually results from wounds by sharp objects, such as nails, which can puncture the skin and also carry the tetanus germ deep into the tissues. There the germ multiplies and invades the central nervous system. Convulsions and muscular stiffness result. The chewing muscle is particularly affected — hence the common name lockjaw.

The first symptom of tetanus usually appears from four days to three weeks after initial infection. The most common early symptoms are stiffness of the neck and painful spasms of the jaw muscles. Later, spasms of other muscles of the body may occur. The patient may be thrown into violent convulsions by any noise or the slightest jar.

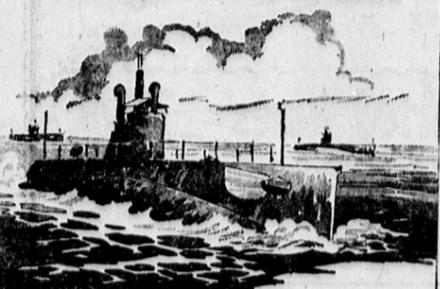

TETANUS IS a fatal disease. Every man, woman and child should have the safeguard of tetanus immunization. Due to the wide adoption of immunization for children, the death rate from tetanus has shown a gradual decline. But its threat still exists.

Persons living in areas, or engaged in occupations, where there is a special risk of tetanus should be actively immunized against the disease.

Immunization usually requires an initial series of three injections of tetanus toxoid followed by a "booster" shot one year later. An additional shot every three or four years will satisfactorily maintain resistance. Immunization also requires that dose be given whenever a wound is incurred which might be infected with tetanus.
