'Conflict of Interest' Problem Taking More of State Spotlight

By VINCENT THOMAS
Assemblyman, 68th District

Legislators are people, which is a fact sometimes forgotten by those not content with the fruits of our parliamentary labors. We share with all others the same needs of supporting our families in reasonable circumstances, just as we do the temptations which come to all who must make decisions large and small.

But as Legislators we find ourselves in the exceptional position of being required to decide our votes in the general public interest, not in that of our own personal ends. From that area of our responsibility arises that currently popular problem, "conflict of interest."

FIRST THRUST into the limelight at the federal level, and dramatized by the sometimes painful divestments of property required of candidates for high national office, the conflict of interest problem soon invaded the legislative realm, with the result that Congress and the Legislatures of two states have enacted laws to limit the possibility of conflicts between private and public interest in matters relating to the enactment of law.

In our two previous regular sessions, bills were introduced which would have established a "code of ethics" for Legislators and other state employees, but were not enacted into law. Two of them recently passed the first house, the Assembly, by substantial majorities after lengthy debate. A third was sent back to committee after extended discussion, and is not expected to reappear.

THE FIRST measure passed would establish a basic code of ethics for all Legislators, legislative employees, and other state administrative employees, consisting of nine major points. It would provide that no such individual could have any interest or engage in any activity which would be in substantial conflict with his public duties.

Other employment which would impair his judgment in his official duties, or require disclosure of confidential information would be prohibited. Use of an official position to secure unwarranted privileges for the office-holders or others would be illegal.

Also prohibited would be participation as a state representative in business with an organization in which the state employee has a financial interest that might tend to conflict with his official duties. All Legislators, officers, and employees would be required to act in such way as to avoid suspicion that they are, or would act contrary to their official duties.

THE BILL would bar personal investments in enterprises which might create conflict of interest. It would also require filing written statements with the secretary of state as to any financial interests of more than $10,000 in any business subject to regulation by the state.

The second measure passed would prohibit any Legislator from participating in the enactment of legislation in which he has a personal interest unless he has first submitted a written statement describing his interest for printing in the daily journal of his house. "Participation" is defined to include both introduction of a bill and advocacy of passage of a bill in committee or on the floor.

CONFLICT OF interest is probably as old as the first legislative body. No one apparently knows why it did not emerge as a problem until recently.

Undoubtedly many other state legislatures, like us, are giving serious consideration to the adoption of ethical codes.

LONG DISTANCE NOTICE (No. 21 in a Series)

A mid-western newspaper received a letter from a British law firm containing a request to print a legal notice. In brief, an English woman had decided to sue for a divorce from her long-absent husband. Under English, as under American law, she had to give due notice of her intentions.

But she and her solicitors (lawyers) knew only as to her husband's whereabouts that he was reported to be in the Midwest. They were not sure but thought it was southern Michigan. An Ohio paper suggested that the notice be published in a Michigan paper, but the reply came back that they wanted the notice published as first requested.

This was done in the legal notice columns. But the story was so unusual the newspaper gave it a "play" in its page one news columns, also. It is not known whether the notice or the news story ever came to attention of the husband.

But this little incident illustrates two things. It shows how the wife moved in a manner to exercise her rights, yet in a way to safeguard those of her husband by putting him on notice and giving him an opportunity to make a counter-move if he desired. In particular, it showed how the bona fide newspapers in an effective and preferred medium for such purposes and how in so doing it renders an important service for which the law provides.
