AiResearch Expanding Research Into Cryogenic Ground Support

The Garrett Corp.'s AiResearch Manufacturing Division has announced it is expanding its product line into the storage, transportation, and pumping of cryogenic fluids for ground support applications.

The expansion, which is an extension of AiResearch's rapidly growing ground support product line, will include a host of new products, a new facility, and the addition of new engineering and fabrication personnel.

The new product line will include the sale and leasing of semi-trailer mounted, high pressure, cryogenic recharger vehicles; cryogenic liquid storage tankers; cryogenic vaporizers; cryogenic high pressure pumps, couplings and samplers.

NEITHER THE number of new employees to be hired or the site for the new facility was announced.

The new cryogenic ground support product line will be an extension of work conducted by AiResearch's Bowcroft facility, which now successfully produces ground support equipment such as jet engine starting vehicles, air conditioning trailers, multi-purpose power vehicles and other ground support equipment.

Under the direction of Joseph Connell, AiResearch's manager of ground support, AiResearch will couple its engineering experience in cryogenics with its ground support production capability to develop the new project line.

"BECAUSE THIS unique engineering experience and production capability already exist, AiResearch will defer high development costs and market cryogenic ground support equipment more economically than is presently the practice," said Connell.

RESEARCH conducted there and in the AiResearch laboratories here and in Phoenix has provided the firm with extensive background in the storage and use of cryogenic fluids.

While AiResearch's experience is in airborne equipment for aircraft and space vehicles, it is a small transition to development ground support systems, according to Connell.

Connell cited the gasturbine as an example. The small gas turbine was produced originally to start military jet aircraft. However, its use was extended to provide not only starting, but now electric and hydraulic power, as well as power for pneumatic and freon air conditioning.
