YOUR PROBLEMS

by Ann Landers

'This is NOT Right Attitude . . .'

Dear Ann Landers: I'm 17 and you'll probably think me very stupid, but please tell me how to conduct myself when a fellow in the crowd tells a naughty joke.

I'm fairly popular and don't want to be thought of as a prude. Yet I must confess I feel the blood rush to my face when I hear an off-color joke in a mixed crowd.

Last evening three couples triple-dated. One of the guys told a joke which I thought was pretty raw. Everyone laughed. The other two girls in the crowd almost rolled on the floor. Ten minutes later when we girls went to the powder room I asked them what was so funny about the joke. I didn't understand it. Both girls confessed they didn't understand it either.

I asked them why they laughed so hard. They said because they didn't want the fellows to think they were square. Is this the right attitude? — THE DUMMY

Dear Dummy: No, this is not the right attitude. Fellows lose respect for girls whose motto is "Anything goes."

To begin with, a gentleman doesn't tell off-color jokes in a mixed crowd. Fellows who don't know better should be set straight — and in plain language.

Dear Ann Landers: Sometimes your advice is good. Other times you sound like a dingbat. Not long ago a woman wrote in about trouble with relatives. You said "If you can't get along WITH relatives, then get along WITHOUT them."

Well, I can't get along with my husband's sisters worth a darn. I'd love to get along without them, but they won't let me alone.

Each Sunday after church they drop in with their husbands and two carloads of kids. They just expect dinner. We have never been invited to their homes although they DO have stoves and buy groceries, I'm told. I'm not talking about four people, Ann, I mean 11. What can we do now that they've grown accustomed to our place? — ELSIE

Dear Elsie: If you permit people to impose on you this way then you're the dingbat, not me.

Plan to eat out next Sunday after church (it's got to be cheaper than feeding 11 extra people.) When they complain about not finding
