

Here's a Grandma With Young Ideas

By Count Marco

If you're the average American grandmother, you usually do one of three things:

You either sit around the house discovering new illnesses to whine over; or become a permanent baby-sitter for your grandchildren, thereby fostering Momism to an even worse degree; or, as Harriet Howe did, you can find a new interest in life. Mrs. Howe joined her husband in a brand-new business venture and helped make a success of it.

Not all American women are lazy, sloppy and inefficient, even though you may think I think so. Mrs. Howe, a grandmother three times over, waited until her daughter was grown and away from home before she tackled the problem of working.

And she didn't do it just because she needed money for one more household gadget to open a larger size can of beans; she did it to build a more solid future than ever with her husband.

As secretary-treasurer of Howe Services, Mrs. Howe travels constantly with her husband, analyzing, studying and creating safety messages for women in industry through the dramatic use of high fashion colors. She studies the newest fashion trends here and abroad, then incorporates them into message displays with an impact.

But we didn't confine our luncheon talk exclusively to safety; we talked of the American husband and wife.

It is Mrs. Howe's contention that a wife is no more perfect than her husband, and it is she through analyzing her own faults helps the husband to overcome his.

"The right wife never does a thing to annoy her husband," she claims. Which, of course, is just what I've always maintained.

Instead of heaping all the little miseries into little piles and throwing them into his face when he comes home expecting peace, quiet and a bit of loving, pile up all the good things you can think of and be happy you have such a perfect specimen around the house.

After all, as Mrs. Howe said, he's as perfect as you are, and you are pretty perfect, aren't you?
