Do Men Think Better Of Cars Than Mates?

By Count Marco

"These American creeps struggle harder to keep their cars from being repossessed than they do to save their marriages," a woman whined.

Judging from the tone of her letter, I can imagine why a man married to her would rather have a car any time.

She implies that the European men are far superior to the American male, a conclusion she reached because after she practically knocked one down with flattery he kissed her three times on the lips.

"Ah, me" she wrote, "they are so masterful and romantic!"

Yes, I agree European men are masterful and romantic, but so are American males when they have reason to be. Unfortunately, though, so few of you American women arouse these instincts either in him or in the European male.

On the other hand, in Europe the women think the best catch of all is the American male, because they find him so kind, considerate, generous almost to fault, humorous, handsome, neat, clean, loyal, mistress-proof (in comparison to the European male), an excellent father and a good provider.

So you see you have your bluebird of happiness right in your own back yard, but you're feeding it the wrong bird seed. Even bluebirds get tired of the same old diet and go south to some other birdhouse.

Before you start looking out your window and dreaming of hands across the sea, practice a little more on your homemade product. You might get to like it.

Most American women who marry European men give up after the first few years because they can't stand the discipline he imposes, nor can they hold up their end of what he has been trained and taught to believe a real wife does.

There are different schools of thought in Europe and America on what is to be expected from a wife, and your schooling here leaves much to be desired.

Be content with what you have, because his schooling is lacking too, and he hasn't yet learned that overseas there is something special and superior for him, ready, willing and able to make him masterful and romantic.

If you don't smother him with your local brand of loving he may just take his car instead, and there you'll be, not only without a man but without transportation.

You may have to walk for a change. Then what will you do? (Distributed by Chronicle Features.)
