By TERRENCE O'FLAHERTY

America is not the only nation with problems of segregated schools. An NBC News Special recently spent an hour probing Britain's educational separation of its relatively tiny governing class (one out of 50) from those who will be governed. Titled "Britain: Changing Guard." The separation is not one of color but one of education and class. The right boys go to Eton, then on to Oxford or Cambridge.

Probably nowhere in the world today is a young person's future so clearly predestined as in England, where the class structure of "The Establishment" is as solidly constructed as the Tower of London. If one's parents are "the right sort" and if one goes to the right schools, one naturally meets the right people and marries the right sort of girl and continues the formula.

I'M JUST HONEST enough to admit that I think this is a dandy way to run things. The British have had it this way for generations and there is no contentment so secure and smug as British contentment. They may not have India but, by golly, they've got peace of mind.

I suppose it is easy enough for Americans to look over and approve the "Old School" network of education, intermarriage and religion because most Americans are snobbish enough to think they would naturally be among the governing class, were they English. When you're in, you're in.

The only fly in the ointment, is the fact that if you are out, you are very much out.

"IT BOILS DOWN to this," commented a Laborite member of Parliament: "It's pretty difficult to break into the governing class unless you are exceptionally forceful or exceptionally gifted."

Despite this observation, statistics show a growing number of young men from the other side of the tracks are going to Oxford and Cambridge. But judging from the documentary, the upper class (or "public school" boys) are in a better position to accept and understand the other young men than the others are of overcoming their feeling of inferiority.

Anthony Wedgewood Benn observed: "Accent plays a very big role in British society, and anyone who goes to the right schools acquires the accent—rather like the one I'm talking now. You can call it the King's English or BBC English or the Oxford accent. And this is really the passport to success. The Welsh accent is not considered okay. The Scots' accent is okay, but all other accents are a barrier to advancement. "The visible badges of their school status are their accent a vocabulary, the way of expressing themselves, a sort of verbal posture."

IT HAS LONG been a claim of British friends of mine that the stuffy Englishman of the stage no longer exists. A brief description of the traditional English hunt by the eighth Earl of Bathurst was a clear refutation of the claim. He stood in front of a fireplace and spoke in great detail even down to the matter of what food to take on the hunt:

"For eating, we usually take sandwiches. I like toast sandwiches with cold bacon in them. They fit snugly in the pocket and the great advantage is that the toast doesn't crumble up as ordinary bread does. Some people—probably the ladies—don't take anything at all. For one reason, a packet of sandwiches makes a rather bulky showing on an otherwise smart hunting coat."

Joseph C. Harsch observed in his narration: "There are valid reasons why the Britons cling to their venerable traditions: Living on an island, they need institutions which bind people together. The pageantry acts as an ever-present restraint against sudden and violent change. It reminds people of a common heritage."

BUT IT WAS for Cecil Harmsworth King to make the final comment:

"I think we are retreating from Empire in very good order. That is a much as you can expect one generation of Englishmen to achieve successfully."

Law in Action

Just How Legal Are 'Potlucks'?

Are potluck dinners legal? In 1961 the law covering "restaurants" was amended, raising doubt as to these diners' legality and thus the old standby money raiser for clubs and churches.

The law was then clarified in 1962. (Health & Safety Code section 28522) churches, clubs and societies can serve food if it is:

1. Without charge to members or sold at a reasonable charge to members.
2. Or, sold to the general public at "occasional fund raising events."

THE LAW specifically says that the club or society cannot serve or sell food as a primary purpose or function of the club. Nor can the group have a full time employee or member assigned to the job of preparing dinners. This shows that the club or church is running a restaurant.

The Restaurant Act applies

Montgomery Attends EC Press Day

Frances Hansen, editor of the Knight Life, Bishop Montgomery's newspaper, will compete in regional write-offs at San Bernardino High School April 11. Miss Hansen was one of 10 finalists at the newspaper day hosted by Los Altos High School.

Members of the Knight Life staff participated in the El Camino College Press Day with other area high schools last Friday.

to "eating establishments." So an occasional cake sale by a non-profit club or church is not an eating place.

Much depends on what the concern's job is. Church groups and clubs serve food only as an incidental part of their social work. They have no full time staff. Or food servers. But some clubs do have diners regularly with a staff to prepare and serve the food. If so, they must meet all public health rules.

THE ACT is broad: The California law specifically lists clubs and organizations, boarding and guest houses, school cafeterias, catering services, and living groups that regularly sell or give food to guests, patrons, or the public, as "restaurants." The health rules aim to make sure that food is well prepared in sanitary kitchens. Equipment and workers must meet certain standards.

Potluck and cake sales often meet these standards, and the law would have to restrict their use. Most clubs and church groups do not pay tax on their social functions, often having a tax exemption for all income
