Cobalt Unit Installed at Shell Co. Torrance Plant

A cobalt-60 irradiation unit, a research tool used in radiation process studies, will be installed this week at Shell Chemical Corporation's Synthetic Rubber Division research laboratory at Torrance.

The new unit represents another step by Shell to promote the scientific application of atomic energy, Dr. John Anderson, research director at the Torrance installation, said today.

Dr. Anderson said the radiation derived from the cobalt-60 source will be utilized in the study of improved rubber and plastics products and the development of radiation-resistant products for use in atomic power plants.

The 20,000-curie unit is being shipped to Torrance by truck from Philadelphia according to standards specified by the United States Atomic Energy Commission and other responsible agencies.

The new facility will supplement an existing three million volt Van de Graaf accelerator already used by Shell's Chemical affiliate, Shell Development Company at Emeryville, Calif., in research activities for all Shell companies.

The cobalt source consists of 20,000 curies of radioactive cobalt which emits the gamma radiation necessary for research work. A curie is a measurement of the number of radioactive atoms disintegrating in one second in a given amount of radioisotope.

The cobalt-60 in the shipment weighs about two pounds and is enclosed in 13 tons of steel-covered lead shielding—a portable package unit designed and constructed in Philadelphia by Nuclear Systems, a division of the Budd Company.

RADIATION TEST—A cobalt irradiation unit delivered for research at the Torrance plant of the Shell Chemical Synthetic Rubber Division, is being probed for radiation by James T. Harlan Jr., left, radiation laboratory supervisor, and Jack Rogers, director of the occupational health division of the Los Angeles Health Department. Radiation is no greater than that given off by a wrist watch, the officials explained. —Press Photo
