No Specific Cure Discovered For Infection by Trichinosis

ROY O. GILBERT, M.D.
Trichinosis is a disease of hogs fed on garbage containing the cysts of trichinae. Other animals, including rats and bears, also may be a source of infection. It is one of the animal diseases that may be transmitted to man, and this generally occurs through the eating of infected pork or pork products insufficiently cooked.

The cause is a worm that lives in the muscles of infected animals. When the undercooked meat of these animals is eaten, the parasite develops into worms that reproduce in the intestinal tract.

The infant worms or larvae pass through the intestinal wall into the blood stream and lodge in the muscles of the human body where they eventually build up a wall or cyst around themselves. The severity of the disease depends upon the number of living larvae that are eaten, and on the person's resistance.

Some years ago it was estimated that about 16,000,000 persons in the United States were infected.

The infection is generally not of a serious nature.

Symptoms that may occur in severe infections include nausea and vomiting, diarrhea or constipation, and abdominal cramps which result from the irritation of the intestinal tract by the adult worm. Fever and swelling of the eyelids also are common symptoms. Inflammation in the muscle fibers is noticed in the form of swelling or pain, particularly when the individual uses the muscles involved.

Most states, including California, have laws requiring the cooking of commercial garbage fed to hogs. However, there is no control over the farmer who may feed his hogs garbage in which there are scraps of pork containing trichina cysts. Even in grain-fed hogs there is a possible danger of infection, since these animals may eat any dead rats that are found which might be a source of the infection.

The individual's best protection is to cook all fresh-pork products thoroughly before eating, and this includes bacon, sausage, and similar foods. Government inspection to ensure freedom from trichinosis is carried out only in the case of products intended for consumption without cooking, such as smoked ham, liverwurst, salami, and similar products. In the case of all other pork meats, people must rely on cooking. The use of a meat thermometer is the only reliable way of determining that pork is sufficiently cooked.

There is no specific remedy for the disease. In severe cases that may involve the central nervous system or the heart, certain medications are given to make the patient more comfortable. Plenty of rest is essential. Light infections generally do not give rise to serious symptoms, and recovery is usually uneventful.

Indeed, many people have had such an infection without being aware of it.
