Mme. Bilgin Tells Role of Woman in Native Land

The male animal throughout the world may contemplate the problems of statehood and atomic industrialization, but a woman's world is much the same here or abroad.

Mme. Sitki Bilgin, wife of Konya's mayor, said of her trip to Disneyland Thursday, "How much I wish my children could see all this too."

A charming brunette, perhaps a bit shy in a foreign country, but with a simple sophistication we have yet to attain, she became instantly animated when queried about her family of two—Ali, a boy of nine months, and Fusun, meaning One Who Captures the Heart, her six-year-old daughter.

Mme. Bilgin was born in Konya and graduated from the Girl's Institute. How does the institute compare to our high schools?

"They are very much alike, but in Turkey we place more emphasis of the feminine arts of cooking, flower arrangements, sewing, and fashion designing," she said.

She added that there is a very active PTA in Konya, which she plans to join when Fusun starts school next year.

What are her impressions of Americans and Americans?

"Americans are so tall," she laughed, "and so friendly. Everyone seems happy here."

Mme. Bilgin also expressed appreciation of the American woman's kitchen, which she hopes will become part of Turkish standard equipment before long.

Parts of Americana that had invaded Turkish culture she noted were rock and roll, and blue jeans.

U.S. books and magazines also are readily available in Konya, and many of our plays have been translated for Turkish theater.

"When asked about the role of women in Turkey, Mrs. Bilgin was quick to explain that the status of Turkish women is very similar to that in the United States.

"We vote, attend coed schools and colleges, and work as you do," she said. However she drew the line when asked if Turkish men

It's A Wise Parent

A Common Sense Approach to Your Child

By Janice Coe

Dear Miss Coe,

I can't figure out my mother-in-law... but she is making me so mad I'd like to keep our son away from her completely.

When he was little she spoiled him rotten. Everytime he went to her house she'd stuff him with every kind of treat she made just for him.

Now that he's 13 she keeps criticizing him, picking on his manners, and never makes him anything special the way she used to. He's getting a very strong feeling that his grandma doesn't love him.

What can I do to make her see the light?

Mrs. Z. P.

Dear Mrs. Z. P.

Let your son start treating Grandma instead of the other way round.

It will do him good to think in terms of bringing her something special when he visits. She may be getting to the age when she needs evidence of love from her family, and, like a child, she picks or quarrels to get attention.

Teach your son to understand the processes of growing old. It's something we should all know. People live much longer now than they used to... but the science of geriatrics (care and treatment of the aged) is still in its infancy.

Explain to your son that he's a big boy now, and if Grandma were still stuffing him he'd probably be too big.

But... protect him from picking by telling your mother-in-law, as you have every right to, that you and his father will be glad to correct any faults he may have... if she will tell you about them, not the boy!

College Wives Host Faculty

The newly organized Harbor College Faculty Wives Club entertained members of the college administration and faculty Friday evening at the University Club of Long Beach.

The event honored new instructors and provided an opportunity for faculty members and their families to become better acquainted.

A shaggyboard dinner was followed by dancing. Special feature of the program was the appearance of Long Beach State College coed Lois Wright, who danced selections from "Kismet." Arrangements for the event were handled by Mrs. Stuart Friedman, president, assisted by Mrs. Edward R. Robings, secretary and Mrs. Robert W. Dunn, treasurer.

MARDI GRAS FETE—Enjoying the St. Catherine Labourer Council's Mardi Grass dance are Mr. and Mrs. George Neeland, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Settle and Mr. and Mrs. Jack Held. Event took place Friday at Club Alondra. G. G. Gardner orchestra played.
