

Phone Company Finds Missiles That Hit Ocean

The impact point of a missile or re-entry vehicle hitting the ocean now can be pinpointed by underwater detection systems developed for the Navy by the Bell Telephone Laboratories.

Detection systems have been installed at the Atlantic and Pacific Missile Ranges, according to Pacific Telephone Manager Dick Pyle. When a missile hits the water, the impact creates noise signals that are used to locate the spot where it fell.

Two types of acoustic systems are used in locating the missile impact point by recovery teams in finding the missile nose cones after their space flights. One is a surface-impact system and the other is a Sofar (Sound Fixing and Ranging) bomb method.
