Design Engineer Gains Promotion

Appointment of Harry E. Cornish, veteran design engineer of Palos Verdes, as program manager for the missileer aircraft, which will be developed by Douglas Aircraft Company for the Navy, was announced today by C. R. Able, vice president-defense programs for the company.

promoted to chief, Aircraft Design Sections, a position he held until chosen to direct the company's competition for the missileer.

Prior to coming to California in 1939, Cornish lived in Denver, Colorado.

He resides at 3800 Via Polomino, Palos Verdes, with his wife and two children.

Cornish has been acting program manager of the missileer project since October, 1959, when the company entered competition for the new missile launching aircraft.

Torrance Firm Expands Testing Division Lab

Horkey-Moore Associates, a division of Houston Fearless Corporation, announced the expansion of their Testing Division facilities to include a Fluids Contamination Analysis Laboratory today.

In announcing the assignment, Able said Cornish's extensive background in design engineering extends over 21 years. He will bring broad experience to the vital missileer program.

Part of the general expansion program in progress at the laboratories, the addition allows the Fluids Testing Department a full range of tests for fuel and hydraulic equipment.

Cornish joined Douglas in 1939 at the El Segundo division where he designed hydraulic and landing gear for the famed SBD. In 1945 he became Chief, Hydraulic Engineering and Landing Gear Design Section, and in 1955 was named Assistant Chief, Design Section, Attack Aircraft.

When completed, the Testing Division will include facilities for all phases of testing aircraft, missile, spacecraft and commercial fuels.
