'Prospectors' or What? Adorn Local Streets

A trio of blue-covered workmen performing a strange ritual in the streets has puzzled residents of the southwest area for years.

The first man drills a tiny hole through the pavement; next, a technician aims what looks like a Geiger-counter down the hole and takes a reading; completing the cycle, the third man hammers the hole full of sand and repairs the pavement.

Followed by a truck that wards off approaching traffic, they move up the street a few feet and repeat the strange procedure.

Are they prospecting for uranium? Or oil? "Fair questions," smiled Georg Babbe, Southwest division manager of the Southern California Gas Company, "their routine does look crazy, but I assure you it makes sense."

"They're one of our distribution crews making routine checks of the pipelines in the area, and the 'Geiger-counter' is actually a highly sensitive electronic instrument that tells us our pipes are in good condition," he explained.

Babbe added jokingly that although this method of testing draws the most interest from "sidewalk superintendents," another, and less spectacular way of checking pipelines is also used.

"Under this system the men work in pairs," he said, "and use a manually operated 'probe' for sinking test-holes where pipelines are located in parkways or other un-paved areas."

During a normal year, Babbe added, gas company distribution crews will inspect approximately 420 miles of pipeline in the southwest area.
