Men's Knotty Tie Problems Take on Some New Twists

For some it's a knotty problem, but it needn't be if men select the proper tie knot to suit as their collar style. Most men, however, knot their ties in the same manner all the time because they are unaware of the several different variations afforded them.

A tie is the focal point of a man's dress and often is the only way he can express any individuality. Using a different knot can add a new look to his appearance.

At a recent meeting the Men's Tie Foundation, an organization made-up of the designers and manufacturers, re-introduced a new tie knot, the "half Windsor." Specifically designed to coordinate with the new British look in shirts which feature medium spread shorter collar points, it is also good for the man who prefers the less full look of the regular Windsor knot.

Aside from the bow tie and new "half Windsor," two other knots are now popular. The traditional four-in-hand is the thinnest in demension and is a must if the man prefers Ivy inspired button-down oxford shirts with the tab or pin tab varieties, both of which have a very narrow spread between the collar points. It is flattering to the man with a full face and short neck as the thin knot helps his facial appearance.

For those who favor the continental or widespread collar models, the Windsor knot is ideal. Its triangular shape adequately fills in the space between the collar points. This knot is suitable for the man with the very lean face.

For a tie to look its best whatever the knot, it should always have a slight indentation called a "dimple" in the center immediately under the knot. This is easily done by creating the tie with the forefinger just before securing the knot in place.

Tie patterns and colors this season provides a man with a wide variety of possible choices to suit his individual tastes. Most popular will be colorfully striped repps followed closely by solid color surface in the rest creations, tone-on-tone designs, and subtle under the knot pattern effects. The most important color treatment include olive and gold, with silk the most desired fabric.
