Moon Shot Moves Nearer As Douglas Ships S-IV

The first Cape Canaveral-bound S-IV stage of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Saturn rocket has been sent from the Santa Monica plant of Douglas Aircraft Co., in what Douglas described as a "move that will speed the nation's moon exploration program."

Douglas explained that, although this S-IV will not be launched, its arrival at the Cape for an extensive test program will hasten operational flights of Saturn later in 1963.

Douglas Missile and Space Systems Division is the prime contractor to NASA for the S-IV, second stage of the Saturn.

It will arrive at Cape

Canaveral in about two weeks after an ocean voyage from Los Angeles harbor through the Panama canal. The S-IV is scheduled to be "mated" to the Saturn first stage for checkout of NASA launch facilities at the Cape.

The tests will check the ability to launch and the ability of the vehicle to accomplish the loading of cryogenic propellants at temperatures as low as 423 degrees below zero, as in the case of liquid hydrogen, the S-IV propellant.

Tests will continue until the first flight-type S-IV arrives at the Cape later this year.

The S-IV will undergo other tests designed to checkout the many systems and circuits associated with the launch operation and to verify test-stand equipment and blockhouse procedures.

Douglas is conducting stationary test firings of the full six-engine cluster of the S-IV at the company's Sacramento installation.

During two recent static tests, the engines were fired for seven minutes, which is the full duration of their actual operating time in space.

The engines are built by Pratt and Whitney Aircraft Division.

Letters

Dear Editor:

One of most gratifying aspects of the recent Proposition 1-A bond issue was the vigorous support it received from the press of California.

That support indicates that our newspapers understand the goals and problems of public higher education in California and are concerned with providing the best possible college education to qualified students.

Speaking for the California State Colleges, I want to assure you that your understanding and concern are deeply appreciated by those of us assigned to carry on the work of education.
