

Columbia Youngsters Hold Camp

Camp Long Horn completed its week-long sessions at a cookout breakfast Friday. Ordinarily, there wouldn't be much in the news about breaking up a camp, but in this case the camp is located on the campus of a Torrance school, and the campers are summer school students at Columbia School.

The school is for youngsters who are physically or mentally handicapped. The students spend their time learning to keep house, raise vegetables, or develop other skills. As a climax to their summer studies, the students devoted the last week to learning about the lore of cream maker and another group mixed pancake batter. FOR FIVE days, the youngsters pitched tents, made bedrolls, cooked by buddy burner and discussed the dos and don'ts of camp behavior. Each day, awards were given to the safest camper, the best sportsman, best cook, best camper, and the most cheerful camper. As an added attraction, the students hiked through nearby El Nido Park one morning.

Friday, the campers devoted the day to demonstrating their newly acquired skills. One group cranked the ice
