

The Latest Status symbol? Having Own Totem Pole

By REYNOLDS KNIGHT
Something new has been added to modern art, but this art form innovation, unlike some, is proving to be a re-sounding commercial success. Suddenly the totem pole is very "in," and artists are busy making the decorated columns for hotels and motels, restaurants, apartment buildings, and even for patios and garden settings. There's one big difference between these and the traditional wooden monuments—these are made in one-tenth the usual time because the artists are using a chain saw to turn out the pole carvings. The chain saws bite into the wood with a chisel action, leaving a finish very similar to that made by hand tools. When white people first came here they found totem poles in front of almost every Indian village, with each pole having a religious significance and the tribe's pictorial history. Many villages traditionally had the poles made by left-handed artisans, some of whom are still active. Their output is low, however, and the modern artist, not necessarily a "lefty," has stepped in to fill the commercial vacuum.

BRIGHT SIDE—The massive blackout that gripped the Northeast recently did have a bright side for some companies. For example, Worthington Corporation has been receiving inquiries daily concerning its jet peaking and emergency power unit, a machine capable of generating thousands of kilowatts in a matter of minutes after start-up. William A. Fraser, the company's sales vice president, reported that one of the company's units is credited with saving the city of Holyoke, Mass. from darkness during the blackout of 12,000-kilowatt unit, put in operation there in 1964 to handle peak loads and emergencies, was put in immediately after the city's electric division noted trouble. The unit provided the necessary power to maintain Holyoke's system at 100 per cent capacity and also to feed power to neighboring communities. "One of the benefits of the units is that they can provide power within minutes, making them the fastest large power available today," the Worthington spokesman noted.

TILE COMPLAINT—Japanese tile producers are accused of violating the antidumping act by using prices here ranging from 35 to 45 per cent below the price of similar tile in Japan's home market. Ceramic Tile Manufacturers of the United States say that as a result Japan's share of the U.S. wall tile import market has risen to an all-time high of 70 per cent. Domestic producers contend that the import penetration of Japanese tile has more than quadrupled in the last eight years, and are asking for a thorough investigation to determine whether sales have been made here at "less than fair value." Claiming substantial injury to small domestic tile industry, they are asking for a special dumping duty on the importation of ceramic glazed tile from Japan.

The U.S. makers say that recent analyses indicate that the pattern of import penetration in fall tile is following that of floor tile. Similarly, they add, if present trends continue, Japan tile will account for more than 60 per cent of the U.S. wall tile market within five years.
