LAW IN ACTION

Is drug addiction a crime or a disease? All agree that it is an evil. But can addiction so control a person that his acts are a result of sickness rather than criminal motives? California's law has made addiction a crime. Jones thus convicted, appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. The court reversed Jones' case, on the grounds that addiction was an illness. To punish a person for his illness would be cruel and unusual punishment and would violate the Constitution.

THE STATE may properly make possession, sale, and use of narcotics a crime, but it cannot make the mere "status" of becoming an addict a crime.

This decision gave a new meaning to "cruel and unusual punishment." The Constitution prevents barbaric and inhumane treatment of prisoners once found in England.

The clause also prevents disproportionate punishments in relation to the crime charged. Thus taking away a person's citizenship for a relatively slight offense has been held to be unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has the power to supervise state penal laws and to review the punishments of crimes.

IN NARCOTICS cases the Supreme Court felt that the addict might be cured by physical treatment but the threat of punishment would not stop his narcotics craving.

The State's attitude in confining the addict may be important. If he is put away for "remedial" purposes this may be all right. But if his confinement is largely for punishment then the law may be invalid. In both cases the person may lose his liberty for a time but the law's attitude may determine whether there is "cruel and unusual punishment."

OTHER STATE laws that broadly punish some kinds of anti-social "status" have been struck down as being too vague. A court held a law punishing "common drunks" was too vague to enforce. The
