

NEW POST . . . Lloyd Pettengill, president of Better Foods, Inc., has been elected treasurer of the Southern California Grocers Association. Yosh Inadomi, president of JonSon's Markets, is the association's president.

Law in Action

How good is a government contract if the government wants to break it?

In Colonial days the English king had granted a board of trustees a charter for a college in New Hampshire to run it themselves, and when a vacancy occurred, to name another trustee.

New Hampshire took over the king's power after the Revolution. Fifty years after Dartmouth College's founding, its lawyer came to the U.S. Supreme Court to complain that New Hampshire had voided the king's charter, firing Dartmouth's trustees.

"Could the state do this?" he asked.

WELL, the American lawmakers could do what the king could once have done before the Revolution. But could he have broken his contract? The new Constitution had said that the government could not "impair the obligation of contract."

If so, was New Hampshire bound to a contract it did not like? Yes, said the U. S. Supreme Court. If so, what injury could the trustees claim to have suffered if Dartmouth was taken from them?

What did Chief Justice Marshall's court say?

THE KING's charter was binding on the state. The state injured a trustee who held a position of honor when the state fired him without cause. And so the Supreme Court said the state could not take over the college.

What the Court said of one state contract, the people could expect it to say for all state contracts. You simply can't do business with states which don't live up to their contracts. If state lawmakers could cancel their contracts with private persons at will, then nobody could do business with them. The decision that a contract bound a state was a lift to everybody. At the time, some people growled that Chief Justice Marshall, who wrote the decision, had robbed the states of their sovereignty, but most felt the decision was a good one.
