have driven ahead toward a definite goal of progress, who have sacrificed their own time and energies in the honest and constructive promotion of the government of their municipality and the welfare of their city.
The Santa Fe plan is an argument that has made possible the development of Torrance, and which contributed in such a large measure to the decision of the Santa Fe to make Torrance the focal point of its industrial activities.
Let us keep our civic senses here in Torrance as we have kept them in the past.

OBSERVATIONS

insignificant hardships endured along the route.
* * * * *
THEY should be told that the newspaper in which news is distorted to suit editorial policy is destined to eventual failure; that an editor's opinions should be labeled as opinions, but that news, even when it runs contrary to the paper's policy, should be set forth honestly and without reservations.
They should be told that it is easier to drift editorially with the tide than it is to breast the waves of opposition, but that editorial courage which is founded on honest convictions fairly arrived at and fearlessly set forth pays handsome dividends in money, reader confidence, and self-satisfaction.
* * * * *
THEY should be told that the tendency in journalism toward standardization is undermining all the fine traditions of the craft; that the paper which loses its individuality ceases to be a newspaper and becomes no more than a handbill.
THEY should be told that syndicated matter such as that with which the mails today are flooded, is written to suit an editorial taste and all political hues and is therefore colorless; that the editor who uses too much of this broadcast syndicated matter is the editor of a colorless paper; that a colorless paper is worse than no paper at all; and that without individuality a paper had best suspend publication for all it accomplishes for itself and for the community in which it circulates.
They should be told that newspaper individuality is gained only by dint of the expression of the individuality of the editor; that this individuality should be expressed, no matter what form it takes; that the public soon loses interest in a colorless sheet and continues interest in any paper with individuality, regardless of the exact manner in which that individuality is expressed.
AND there are a few other things, mostly technical, that a group of editors can afford to hear.
The only trouble is that it is easier to set forth these ideas in generalities for the laymen than it is to express them intelligently and in an interesting and technical manner before a group of newspaper experts.
And so the perpetrator of this array of words shall have heaved a voluminous sigh by the time this paper goes its way into the files of past performances.
If that speech were not to be delivered until after this is printed, I would most certainly ask all and sundry to offer up a prayer in my behalf.
But ex post facto prayers won't do me a bit of good.
