THREE COSTUMES FOR THE GIRL AT BOARDING SCHOOL

With my sister, Natalie, home again for the holidays and hordes of children in their middle and late teens trooping in and out of the house, I am beginning to feel like a grandmother. My dear, Natalie gives dinner parties (small and unpretentious) to be sure, but she calls them dinner parties, and the youngsters all go off together under the watchful eye of Felicie, to their very gay sub-deb affairs. And by the time they come rolling back, it is the middle of the night and, if I am not out myself, I am sound asleep. They spend most of the middle of the day at luncheons, Natalie, looking the very epitome of "What the Young Girl Should Wear," goes to the dances.

But in the rare moments that she finds to devote to her family, she is a very likeable person. Boarding school is improving her, for besides the moral and mental gain she is getting out of it, she is developing a few domestic tendencies for which she is going to thank her stars of chic some day, for she is learning to make her own clothes.

Natalie really has inherent good taste, is wise enough to avoid over-taste, and she wears a costume that is simple, smartly appropriate to her age.

Since she is quite active in sports at school, she has devoted much time, thought and effort to making sports clothes, and the results are really admirable. At the left, I have sketched an outfit, which she wears of dull red jersey and, as a final touch of smartness, is utterly untrimmed. She wears it tucked inside a grayish tweed skirt with a circular front and pressed creases. The wide buttoned belt gives it a slim hip-line and holds the skirt and blouse firmly in place.

Finding this outfit both comfortable and smart, Natalie used the same pattern for a pale cream velvet skirt and a silk crepe blouse of the identical color. With blouse she wears a velvet jacket in a darker shade. The collar is narrow and straight and may be worn standing, and the sleeves have pointed tops.

The little challis frock in the center of the group, she wears around school to classes and occasionally on Sundays.

Really, it's more fun having Natalie here. It's like being sixteen all over again.

Love, Claribel.

So our lady repairs to her wardrobe, where she selects a costume that will carry the cost and to which she adds her smartly thought-out whole day's program. Let's see—a suit will be the best. She takes down one of rather rough black woolen. The long coat has a belted back and an impressed belt at each side. The skirt matches the coat, and to tuck into it, she chooses a grayish beige silk crepe blouse with a drawn-work yoke. The jaunty scarf, one end of which slips so casually and with such chic through the other is made of black crepe moiré with a long narrow border of black broadtail. The simple pull-on gloves are made of hand-stitched beige suede and the frameless envelope bag of beige box-calf. Her hat is a simple felt, and the shoes, tailored pumps, are made of black box-calf with high solid leather heels and brogue trimming. (She might have chosen an oxford, with equally good results, so the sketch shows oxfords, too). Not the least interesting detail is the ring she has chosen to wear on her little finger. With its sapphire set in platinum, with diamonds and cabochon rubies, it has the popular tri-color motif.

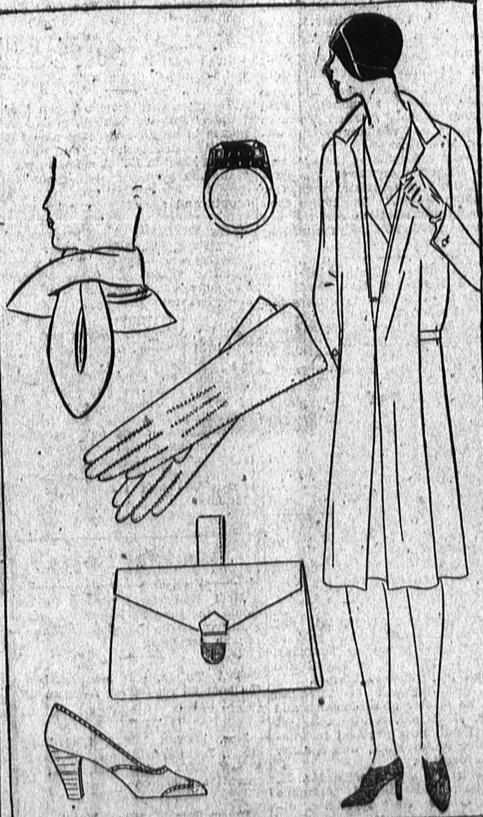

So saily forth, dear lady, to be stared at with envy by your less chic sisters on Park Avenue.

First, shopping—odious, but necessary. There are a few essentials to be done. Then a one o'clock luncheon engagement with Elise at Pierre's and straight from her demitasse to a two-thirty appointment at the hairdresser's. She will be a little late for the concert at Carnegie Hall, where that famous pianist is going to play, but it can't be helped and his opening numbers will probably be dull anyway. On the way home, she may drop in at Adele's where there may be some amusing people in for informal tea.

THE PERFECT TOWN ENSEMBLE

The sketch at which you may not say, for we know nothing about her personally. But for a day in town, the chic of her apparel is unquestionable.

She has probably risen about ten o'clock, after a not-too-heavy breakfast of grapefruit, black coffee and a muffin or two, to step into her green-tinted bathroom and under a refreshing shower. That done, as she cleanses, whitens and powders her face (not forgetting her neck), she muses pleasantly
