Arthur Lake Is Also "Dagwood" off Screen

Arthur Lake is probably the only actor in Hollywood who, at one time or another, has never complained against being "typed." While most actors will shy at playing two similar roles in succession, Arthur has played "Dagwood" in Columbia's "Blondie" series for four and a half years without a murmur!

"Look at the fun I'm having," insists Lake whenever he is asked about the role. "Why I wouldn't dream of objecting to it!"

Born in Corbin, Ky., Arthur made his stage debut when he was just two weeks old. His parents, famous for their vaudeville act, needed a squalling baby and Arthur fitted the role perfectly. He squaled.

While most kids were mastering nursery rhymes, Arthur was learning the rudiments of his profession. For years he slept in a big theatrical trunk while his parents tramped their way across the country. In fact, he didn't even attend formal school until his 11th birthday.

But by 1924, Lake had become one of the most talented youngsters on the stage at that time and he played his first movie role with Franklyn Farnum. His first talking picture was "Air Circus" with Sue Carol, in 1928, and his first really "grown-up" role was the juvenile lead in "Harold Teen."

This latter comic strip characterization inevitably led to the "Blondie" series at Columbia. However, before he became movie-land's foremost funny paper hero, Arthur had played top roles in "Cradle Snatchers," "Dance Hall," "Tommy," "There Goes My Heart," "Topper" and many other hit films.

Lake's latest "Blondie" hit for Columbia is "It's a Great Life," starting Saturday at the Plaza Hawthorne theater with Penny Singleton, Larry Simms and Hugh Herbert also featured. Frank Strayer produced and directed the hilarious comedy.
