Million More Now Depend On Aqueduct

The number of people living in Southern California cities that now use Colorado river water has increased by more than one million since 1941, when the Colorado river aqueduct began taking water deliveries here.

Population in cities supplied with Colorado river water has been from 2,170,000 to 3,250,000 in the past seven years, he said. Normal population gains and the addition of nine cities to the District were said to be responsible for the big increase.

Consider New Recreational Zone Proposal

A new zoning classification for golf clubs and similar recreational areas in county areas is under consideration by the county Regional Planning Commission, upon instructions from the board of supervisors.

The idea was first proposed by Chairman Raymond V. Darby. The motion was presented by Supervisor W. A. Smith, who suggested that the Los Angeles City Planning Commission be asked to cooperate in establishing a unified zoning code.
