Accidents Branded as Greater Killer than Childhood Diseases

The greatest killer of children in the United States is not some contagious disease as one might suppose, but accidents—most of them avoidable.

Each year accidents prematurely snuff out the lives of more children under 14 years of age than do most of childhood's common diseases all put together.
It is an utterly useless expenditure of human life which could be saved in many instances if ordinary safety precautions were taught the children or observed by the adults who look after them.

Children do not realize the meaning of death and disability and frequently expose themselves to dangers that would horrify an adult. So, the responsibility for a child's safety rests with grownups; as a matter of fact, authorities claim that an adult, usually a parent, is either directly or indirectly responsible for almost every childhood accidental death.

Caution, common sense and courtesy are fundamental to safety and should be taught to the child during its pre-school years. Such teaching will carry over as early training so often work, play, school and home. Parent should teach these things not only by word of mouth but also by example, for children copy adult behavior and do not have enough judgment or experience to guard themselves from danger.

No parent can prevent all the little accidents that are bound to happen to any active child. To attempt to do so, might possibly make the child too dependent or timid—or fill him with suppressed anger and frustration. However, positive dangers such as fire hazards, faulty equipment, sharp-edged utensils and tools, poisons of all kinds, slippery floors, and skidding rugs are but a few of the things that should be eliminated from the child's environment.

Common sense should be a basic ingredient in the daily routine care of children. Don't leave infants in the bath water unattended or allow older children to go swimming, or play around deep water, unless closely supervised. Watch carefully when you back the car out of the garage, and teach children to keep out of the driveway and off the street. Do not permit them to do anything that will wantonly endanger their lives or result in some permanent defect, no matter how much they may wish to do it. If discipline is needed, give it. Better a disgruntled child than one who is dead or maimed.

Safety is a family affair. Safety for all ages, but particularly for childhood, requires the cooperation of every member.

Indication of Manhunt Proportions Given by Aviation Co. Magazine

One indication of the employment man-hunt now on was contained in the May 9 "Skywriter," publication of North American Aviation under the heading "Jobs?—They've Got 1500 of 'Em."

D. R. Zook, employment director for North American, said in the article that "despite continued hiring, there are still 1500 job openings at North American."

The Torrance office of the California State Employment Service has been deluged with demands for workers during the recent weeks, according to reports issued by Mrs. Winona Ellis, manager.

HOME OWNERS

An estimated 16 million non-farm families in the U. S. that own their homes today are compared with only about 3.5 million in the year 1900.
