Some Progress Reported on Water Problems

By VINCENT THOMAS
Assemblyman

Signs on several fronts indicate some progress on that all-important water problem which kept your legislators at a constant boil all through the various sessions held earlier this year. The legislative committees and subcommittees assigned to study different aspects of the over-all problem are meeting frequently, and preliminary reports on their work sound almost hopeful.

Perhaps most significant was the repoat from the drafting subcommittee of the Joint Interim Committee on Water Problems that an "absurdly simple" constitutional amendment has been written which might resolve the whole controversy between the north and south. Members of the subgroup said that each would take this preliminary draft back to his district to try it out with his constituents. If it survives that test, the next step would be to bring it before the parent committee.

* * *

THE PROPOSED amendment would leave basic decisions on water conservation and distribution up to the state administration, the Governor and his director of water resources. The latter would determine which projects to construct, who would get the water, and how much would be saved for counties of origin.

Under this proposal, the southern part of the state would not be granted any certain amount of water from northern sources, but would have to depend on the administration for its fair share. In the opinion of spokesmen for the subcommittee, political pressures tend to equalize each other at the Governor's level, so no area could be deprived of its rightful share of the available supply. By keeping hold of the purse-strings for water supply, under the proposal the Legislature would also have great power to assure equitable division of water.

* * *

ANOTHER subcommittee of the same joint group, that on financial and economic policy, has also been holding a number of productive sessions. At one, water officials and experts warned that future water development might bring with it uneconomic expansion of agriculture and land speculation. Supplying water to land of marginal productivity might endanger both our present healthy agriculture and other segments of our economy, they said.

At a second, they were handed a suggestion that the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys establish their own independent water district, through which federal funds could be obtained for water project construction. Also, they were informed that the cost of water development will continue to increase because sites which can be cheaply developed are about gone.

* * *

STILL ANOTHER group, the Assembly Committee on Conservation, Planning and Public Works received from its engineering consultants a partial report covering proposed flood control, water and power construction on the Feather, Yuba, and Sacramento rivers. The study indicates that a multi-unit program costing $341 million could be financed by revenue bonds to be paid off by water and power receipts. Local units could begin immediately on the program, or the Legislature could authorize the state to do so. The report was hailed as a bright spot in the water picture.

That's about the most that can be said right now. At least, it's better than the complete stalemate in which both north and south found themselves locked last spring.
