Improvements Under Way at Victoria Park

Recently completed improvements at the Victoria Park playground were officially approved and accepted this week by the Board of Supervisors, according to Supervisor Kenneth Hahn, under whose administration the work was done.

Included in the work, which was the first phase of the park's development, were site grading, construction of a softball field with backstop, landscaping, a new picnic area, drinking fountains, walks, and a large, well-equipped playground area.

Playground equipment included swings, slides, teeter sets, a merry-go-round, climbers, tether ball set, parallel bars, mazes, arch climbers and a giant slide.

ALL IMPROVEMENTS at the new park and playground are being provided in accordance with Supervisor Hahn's belief in the importance of adequate recreational facilities, for the welfare of the community and as a deterrent to juvenile delinquency.

"It is much wiser and more economical to provide children with well-supervised activities where they can have healthy, wholesome, constructive outlets for their energies than it is to be constantly spending more millions for juvenile halls, courts, probation camps, police officers and judges," Supervisor Hahn declared.

He stated that plans for a recreation building of 4,000 square feet to be constructed in the park later are now being prepared.

Popular Weight-Reducing Drug Found Ineffective After Survey

A widely used appetite suppressant has been found to be ineffective in helping obese persons, a group of eastern scientists reported recently.

The suppressant—phenylpropanolamine—is a common ingredient of weight-reducing drugs which are offered to the public without prescriptions. It has been estimated that about 100 million dollars is spent annually for such drugs, the scientists said.

Their report appeared in a recent issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association.

HEADED BY Dr. Joseph F. Fazekas of Washington, D. C., the group undertook the study to determine the merits of the non-prescription drug as compared with dextro amphetamine, a prescription drug with known appetite suppressing qualities.

The authors said that any effective weight-reducing program must be administered by a physician who understands the psychological factors which are encountered by persons undergoing treatment.

TO CONTROL these psychological factors, the scientists selected 80 obese mentally deficient subjects for their study. The subjects were physically normal and had been residents of the institution for a number of years. Their body weight had been recorded monthly since admission.

The authors explained that the subjects had never been under any dietary restriction and their daily food intake consisted of a well balanced diet known to contain about 3000 calories, which was well above their energy requirements.

The 80 subjects were divided into four nearly equal groups and the blind procedure was employed where neither the recipient nor the administrator knew what agent was being given.

THE SUBJECTS were given one of the drugs under investigation three times a day, one hour before meals, for a period of six weeks. To make certain of their ingestion by the subjects, the drugs were given by cottage supervisors.

According to the authors, "Phenylpropanolamine, when administered in recommended doses, and even in twice the supposedly therapeutic doses, failed to effect a statistically significant reduction in weight. "The administration of dextro amphetamine was associated with a statistically significant reduction of weight. The weight loss apparently results primarily from a reduction of food intake due to a diminution of appetite."

THEY CONTINUED, "The results of the present investigation lend support to the concept that phenylpropanolamine does not exert a marked central nervous effect, at least insofar as appetite reduction is concerned."

The scientists concluded that in view of the many psychological and physiological factors involved, as well as the recognized increased incidence of certain diseases in the obese population, weight reduction should be supervised by physicians, particularly when drugs are used.
