New State Law Sets Up Nuclear Energy Control

Energy makes the wheels go round, and more and more power is needed to turn the wheels needed to keep our economy running smoothly and our standard of living constantly improving. But history has taught us that every kind of applied energy, from horsepower to steam, from water power to electricity, can be dangerous unless properly used.

Atomic energy, newest of man's miracles in power supply, differs from its forerunners in one important respect, that it is inconceivably the most dangerous source of energy so far developed. If it is to be used successfully to increase the welfare and the productivity of people, its dangers must be identified and guarded against. The power of the atom for good is enormous, but so is its power of destruction.

IT WAS with full appreciation of these factors in the peaceful use of nuclear energy that the recent session of our California Legislature considered several measures relating to use and control of such energy. Out of our studies and deliberations came a new law, the "Atomic Energy Development and Radiation Protection Law", which puts us in the forefront among states as to effective acts dealing with the problem involved.

This new statute establishes it as state policy to encourage the constructive development of industries which produce or use atomic energy or radiation, but also to eliminate unnecessary exposure of the people to radiation. The act is intended to assure proper coordination between state government, local agencies, other states, and the federal government, including the Atomic Energy Commission, in matters of law, rules and regulations.

THE LAW creates an office of atomic energy development and radiation protection within the governor's office. It is to be headed by a coordinator appointed by the governor.

This new agency is assigned a number of duties and responsibilities. One of the most important is to keep the public, labor, industry, and all other interests completely informed as possible on development and control of atomic energy in this state.

One of the primary purposes of the law is to secure proper coordination between the rules and regulations of the various state departments and those of the cities and counties relating to nuclear energy or radiation, with those of other states and the federal government. The coordinator is given broad authority in this field, and is designated as liaison officer for dealing with national agencies and other states on matters relating to atomics.

A DEPARTMENTAL, coordinating committee, composed of the heads of 13 state agencies plus the University of California, or their representatives, is set up to assist in the development and coordination of activities by the departments in the atomics field. A nine member advisory council, with representation from local government, industry, labor, medicine, education, science, agriculture, and insurance, is created to sit with the atomic energy coordinator to evaluate programs and make recommendations as to state policy on atomic matters.

Experts tell us that the atom will provide a major source of our total energy needs within comparatively few years. We legislators have tried in this new law to see that California will be ready for that day.
