System to Measure Airport Range Now in Production at Aeronca

A new system to accurately measure and display the range of visibility along an airport's runway has been developed and is now being produced by Aeronca Manufacturing Corp.

Aeronca is producing a quantity of Runway Visual Range signal data converters for the U.S. Weather Bureau, Department of Commerce, and a contract for a runway visual range measuring system utilizing the signal data converter has been awarded Aeronca by the Department of Civil Aviation of the Australian government, John A. Lawler, Aeronca's president, announced.

runway from the point at which the plane touches down to the farthest runway light visible to the pilot.

RVR is now an accepted criteria used by the U. S. Federal Aviation Agency to determine whether or not an airport should be closed because of poor visibility.

THE DEVELOPMENT work and the Signal data converter for the system is being done at Aeronca's Aerospace Division in Baltimore, Md.

Lawler declined to reveal the total money or number of systems involved in the contracts with Australian government or the Weather Bureau, but said the computer production could develop into a major item if production orders continue.

THE U.S. AIR FORCE has also shown interest in the RVR measuring system and a contract may be forthcoming soon, Lawler noted.

The Aerospace Division is the research arm of Aeronca's Defense Products Group. Other divisions are Aeronca of Torrance and Aerostystems of Middletown, Ohio.
