Law in Action

Title Protection

One of the things the law does is to set up ways to prevent property disputes by keeping good records. In the old days of small communities, land holdings passed from one generation to the next without lawsuits. Few questioned a land title which came down through a long line of ancestors.

As cities grew, land became broken up and fell into strangers' hands. They lacked family backgrounds or unbroken records of occupancy. Hence "title searches." Title searches go from seller to buyer back through the long chain of titles, finally to the United States. In going back, the searcher looks to deeds and other public records for all restrictions, easements, and interests anyone may claim in your land.

The county recorder keeps a record of land titles. By going through his indexes you may search a title, but title companies make "abstracts" of their searches and keep them on hand on cards. They need not trace each title each time. They can work fast from their own records accumulated over the years. The title company insures what they claim to check. But such searches may not turn up unrecorded liens, surveys, or the unrecorded rights of parties. The buyer should check these out himself from the seller, the tenants, or the neighbors.

Imperfect titles turn up now and then: Sometimes to clear up flaws, one needs to go to court, naming parties and giving public notice of his action for anybody else who might have a claim to come in to assert it.

Once filed, some claims are good on any property of an owner. Such things as judgment liens and tax claims apply against owners as such, and not his land alone.

Even though recorded, a forged document such as a deed, or "agents without power," or deeds made by an incompetent person are not valid. In transferring property you might well have a lawyer check your papers before you sign them.
