YOUR PROBLEMS

by Ann Landers

"Challenge of Parenthood . . ."

Dear Ann Landers: Thank you for printing the column on mothers who run next door "for five minutes" and while she's gone, the house burns to the ground and small children perish in the fire. It's about time somebody said it.

I know five mothers in holering distance who are guilty of this. My next door neighbor leaves her 8-year-old daughter in charge of four young ones (including a two-month-old baby) while she goes to her "Mother's Club" every Saturday afternoon. She thinks this makes her a good mother.

I showed your column to one of my close friends who also leaves her small children alone at night. She said, "My children will grow up self-reliant and independent. Yours will be clinging vines." Do you wish to comment? — A READER

Dear Reader: One of the challenges of parenthood is knowing where to draw the line between being over-protective and derelict. It is true that when parents smother children with over-protection the youngsters grow up to be emotional cripples. But it is vastly important that their physical safety be assured so that they WILL grow up.

A mature, responsible 12-year-old should be able to care for younger brothers and sisters in the absence of parents. But I don't think children under this age should be left alone, afternoon or evening.

Dear Ann Landers: Several weeks ago my husband brought me a surprise, a mynah bird. We named him Mr. Whiffenpoof — because he struts like a Yale man.

My husband has sort of a sick sense of humor and he's a big tease. He taught Mr. Whiffenpoof to imitate the phone and the doorbell sounds. I am half nuts answering a telephone that has not rung and going to the door to find nobody there.

If you can solve THIS one, Ann Landers, you are a genius. — RUN RAGGED

Dear Ragged: Sorry — I can be only half a genius today. The doorbell problem can be solved by replacing the bell with a giant knocker. Mr. Whiffenpoof may be pretty clever, but he can't imitate THAT.

The telephone problem may be made tolerable by installing an extension so you won't have to run so far. (Continued on page 18)
