Weeping Willow, Pepper, Olive Trees Ideal for Small Gardens

You can look long and hard before finding three more decorative trees than the Olive, the Pepper and the Weeping Willow. They have in common a lacy texture in their foliage and habits of growth that, while different, are alike in being beautiful.

This trio of trees are specially suited to small or medium gardens in general and to California gardens in particular.

The Olive has long been a favorite with members of the California Assn. of Nurserymen, and it is interesting to note how professional landscapers are turning to it more and more. You see it with increasing frequency in the landscaping around new public buildings and as a terrace or patio centerpiece. This takes one back to early California when the Olive was a familiar foreground to Spanish architectural style.

Pepper trees are familiar sights — especially in Southern California, where they once enjoyed frequent use in street and roadway plantings. Their true beauty, however, lies in an individual specimen where the lacy, pendulous branches, knobby trunks and rose-colored berries (similar to pepper corns) can be appreciated. Pepper trees are strictly resistant to drought but do not resent normal watering.

THE GRAY-green Olive is at its very best in full sun and thrives with a minimum of moisture. Underrnourishment suits it better than otherwise, so plant it and forget it.

LAST OF our trio, the Weeping Willow, is similar to a Pepper tree in its pendulous habit, but unlike either Olive or Pepper in the impression it gives the gardener. If an Olive seems made for dry places and Pepper looks at home in either drought or moisture, Weeping Willow is definitely enhanced by proximity to water.

Weeping Willow planted beside a garden pool, or in the middle of a well-watered lawn is the picture of cool contentment. It is a lovely tree under any conditions, but prize-winner for sure when water is always at hand.
