That Itsy Bitsy Majorcan Bikini

I have never seen a celebrity make an entrance quite like this one before. Some have greeted me trailing furs behind them, others wore jewels up to both elbows, a few had gowns created especially to make an impression upon me. And then there were those who, defiantly, came wearing basic black with pearls. But never have I been greeted as I was by Patrice Munsel.

She wore a little thing designed on the island of Majorca. In fact, it was so little that when folded it fits into a penny matchbox. On her it looks not only good, but sensational. After all, she has one of the few figures I've seen on which a bikini does not look vulgar.

Under a hot sun, sipping dietetic root beer beside her pool, we didn't talk about her current starring role as the Countess in the musical "Song of Norway," nor did we discuss that for years she was known as the princess of the Metropolitan Opera.

We did, however, talk about you and the Kingdom of Wisdom. Said Patrice, without any prompting from me: "Every housewife in this country should be given a medal. Any woman who can maintain a house, take care of children, attend civic functions, cook and still keep a husband satisfied deserves not only a medal, but a statue in her honor."

Patrice doesn't go poking her nose into the average American home as I do, so I dismissed her opinion as one not from an authority on that particular topic.

As the butler handed me my second noncaloric drink, I changed the subject. "As an established opera and musical comedy star, I presume your career comes first," I said.

She drew herself up from the lounge and took a deep breath of indignation that certainly emphasized one thing about Majorca bikinis: They're brief indeed. "My husband comes first," she said, casting her eyes to the heavens, "always and absolutely."

On the word "absolutely" her voice went down so deeply into her stomach region you could tell the mere thought of him gave her fluttering butterflies.

"After him, then come my four children. I'm not going to be like some women I know who put their children first. I expect my children to grow up happy and secure, so that when the time comes they'll leave home happily.

"Knowing this, I'm doing everything I can right now to keep my husband No. 1 around this house. If I continue to keep him happy and contented, and if I'm lucky, I'll have him left to keep me company." She hugged her perfect and tanned body in anticipation.

Patrice Munsel started out with a great voice as her chief talent, but she developed an even greater talent—the art of being a woman.

All of you have the same talent. Develop it, as does Patrice Munsel, and you too can be a star. Well, at least in your own home. Could you ask for more?
