'The Edinburgh Caper' Shaggy-Dog Story

William Hogan

The veteran New Yorker writer St. Clair McKelway has produced a perfectly delightful shaggy-dog story in "The Edinburgh Caper." How does one describe it? Well, it's a travelogue essentially. McKelway roamed Scotland during the summer of 1959, in search of ancestral ties. He dined and drank well. He visited some charming Scottish rural areas, and Edinburgh, as he describes it, is a city you will want to investigate fully the next time you are in that part of the world.

Yet there were dreadful little irritations during his holiday; eerie coincidences, sinister frenzies with turbulence or frenzy. Was the fact that McKelway physically resembles certain members of the British Royal family somehow behind these incidents? Was he, indeed the innocent pawn of British intelligence agents, or the United States CID?

McKelway presents his travelogue in a peculiar fashion. He reconstructs these irritations and wild coincidences before a pair of CID officers. In his own mind, his experiences pointed to a bizarre international plot that involved the kidnapping of the Queen, Prince Philip and President Eisenhower, who was about to set down in Scotland prior to a projected summit meeting with Khrushchev.

Were the manifestations of this caper merely the figments of McKelway's own neurosis? He was never sure at the time and for a while neither was his readers.

His Walter Mitty-like absurdities are played a step or two behind this travelogue. The balance of credibility, in any lesser writer, would be much too bold. But McKelway has put together his own "The 39 Steps." He builds his tension as deftly as though the early Alfred Hitchcock were maneuvering him.

"The Edinburgh Caper" is an unclassifiable entertainment, and certainly the most urbane nonsense you are liable to come across this season. This is a travel book no one would dare to write. So let's see — could it be that McKelway really . . . ?

PAPERBACK CHOICE

A. J. Liebling's "The Sweet Science" reissued as a Grove Press Black Cat Book (75 cents). This is a ringside view of boxing by the veteran and astute observer of the prize-fight business who patterns his reportage on the prose of Pierce Egan, the great historian of Boxiana who practiced in England during the late 18th and early 19th centuries.

When the hard-cover edition appeared several seasons back, a friend, in reviewing it for fight fans alone, said: "It is, to borrow a phrase, a hell of a piece of writing."

Law in Action

A gift isn't a gift until it is actually given, until delivery of possession.

Until then it is incomplete. Jones, a widower, had twice been married and had a son by each marriage. He liked his older son Jim better than his younger son, Pete.

HE OFTEN said he wanted Jim to get his home when he died. Jones named Jim in a joint tenancy deed so that, as he thought, Jim as the surviving joint tenant would automatically get the home. Jones put the deed in his safe deposit box and never said a word about it to Jim, but he told Jim to open the box when he died. That's all he said. Now note: Jones never really gave Jim the deed.

AFTER JONES died, Jim found the deed, recorded it, and later claimed the home. Pete, the other son, asked the court to set the deed aside. Since Jones left no will, Pete and Jim would share alike in the estate.

The court did set the deed aside. Since it was never "delivered" to Jim, it was no real gift.

"DEATH DELIVERY deeds" are not valid. There are only certain ways to pass property on at death: For example, by joint tenancy, a life estate, a trust, by will, or by intestacy. The testator may change his will at any time until his death.

Sometimes the law presumes a deed's delivery, especially to young children. A person may make out a deed but hold it for a young child.

THE DONOR may keep the deed in his custody for the child. Even so, someone may challenge this presumption in court.

It is best to make the donor's purposes clear by a will, trust, or other legal paper, and to have these papers expertly drafted. For no one will be there in court to say what you meant, if your words do not convey their meaning clearly and accurately.

Red Cross to Offer First Aid Courses

Classes in standard and advanced Red Cross first aid will be conducted simultaneously, according to Walter West, first aid chairman of the Torrance-Lomita branch.

"This is a wonderful opportunity for people living in our area to learn the latest Red Cross-approved first aid methods," West declared. "These classes are a free service provided by Red Cross and taught by volunteer first aid instructors."

John W. Cooke, 2321 Eldorado St., will instruct the standard first aid class. Teaching the advanced first aid class will be Allen Quignon, 143 E. 216th St.

Both classes will be held from 7 to 9 p.m., Fridays, starting Jan. 18 at the First Baptist Church, 2113 Carson St.

Persons who wish to attend either of the classes may register by telephoning FA 8-0510 or may enroll at the first class.
